PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Imprisonment of a Member

Mr. Speaker: I have to inform the House that I have received a letter dated 6 January 1988 from the resident magistrate in the petty sessions district of Belfast in the following terms:

"Dear Mr. Speaker,

Cecil Walker, Member of Parliament for Belfast, North, pleaded guilty before me at Belfast Petty Sessions on 26 October 1987, to taking part in a public procession, contrary to Article 3 of the Public Order (Northern Ireland) Order 1987. I fined him £50, to be paid within 28 days.

As that fine has not been paid Mr. Walker was today committed to Prison for a period of 7 days, unless the said sum be sooner paid.

Yours faithfully,

Maurice D. McHugh, Resident Magistrate."

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Air Services (Manchester-USA)

1. Mr. Sackville: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consultants he has had with the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority on any recent applications for the licensing of air services between Manchester and the United States of America.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Paul Channon): None, Sir.

Mr. Sackville: Is my right hon. Friend aware that three American airlines have shown keen interest in starting new services from Manchester either to New York or to Boston? As there is general agreement in the north that direct air services from Manchester to our major markets are vital to the regeneration of the area, does my right hon. Friend agree that there are strong arguments for giving American airlines better access to Manchester under a renegotiated Bermuda agreement?

Mr. Channon: I entirely understand my hon. Friend's point of view, and many hon. Members agree with him about that important matter. It is true that the American Department of Transportation is at present considering a number of applications from American airlines for services to Manchester airport. We have continually reaffirmed with the American authorities our willingness to enter into negotiations about access to Manchester. Only last week we retabled proposals for the development of Manchester airport, and the United States Government have undertaken to study them and reply as quickly as possible.

Mr. Snape: Will the Secretary of State assure the House that those applications by American airlines will not be used as a bargaining counter by his Department to reduce the number of flights into and out of Gatwick or Heathrow? The right hon. Gentleman will know that that has been done when previous applications to fly in and out of Manchester have been made.

Mr. Channon: We want to act in the general British interest and in the interests of Manchester itself. Indeed, we have made proposals, which were developed with Manchester International Airport Authority, and which comprise a five-year development plan, providing for the progressive introduction of an agreed number of Manchester services. That plan is intended to form the basis for our discussion. I hope that negotiations can proceed and that they will be found to be generally satisfactory in Manchester as well as elsewhere.

Motorway and Trunk Road Renewal

2. Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport by what date he now expects to eliminate the backlog of motorway and trunk road renewal.

Mr. Channon: By 1992.

Mr. Madel: As the Government continue with their welcome and important programme of clearing the backlog of motorway and trunk road repair and renewal, will my right hon. Friend put into the programme a fourth lane for the M1 in the congested section from Bedfordshire to London, and a fourth lane on certain parts of the M25, which is equally heavily congested?

Mr. Channon: I am grateful for what my hon. Friend said at the beginning of his remarks. With regard to his specific question about four lanes for the M1 and the M25, I shall shortly place a contract for the addition of a fourth lane between junctions 11 and 13 of the M25. I am considering a similar study of another heavily used section between junctions 15 and 16. Just before Christmas I announced a review of the pattern of traffic on the M25 to see whether the capacity of other sections needs to be increased.

On the M1 we are adding some short stretches of climbing lane. I do not think that at this stage it is necessary to have additional lanes because, as the House knows, before long the M40 will be completed between London and Birmingham, and I expect it to carry a substantial part of the traffic.

Ms. Armstrong: Is the Minister aware that there is still continuing disquiet about the progress of work on the A1? We see the A1 as central to the economic development of the north and, indeed, to the development of tourism, but the work means that it is difficult to travel on the road now, and our fears are that even when it is finished it will not be of sufficient standard. I hope that the Minister will reconsider his views on the A1.

Mr. Channon: A tremendous amount of work is being done on the M1. A tremendous amount of improvement is planned for trunk roads in general. The hon. Lady, of course, was referring to the A1. We are determined to make improvements. Let me say gently to the hon. Lady that one of the reasons why there are so many difficulties on the motorways and trunk roads is the backlog of maintenance caused in the late 1970s by the cuts in the maintenance programme.

Mr. Wiggin: Does my right hon. Friend agree that most users of the motorway system believe that it will never catch up? Has not the time come for a major review of the system with a view to increasing capital expenditure substantially and ensuring that the lifeline artery to our industry is brought up to date?

Mr. Channon: A review was carried out as recently as last April. I am sure my hon. Friend will be aware that capital provision for motorways and trunk roads is now higher than it has ever been. Indeed, it is 30 per cent. higher in real terms than it was in 1978-79. We have added 740 miles of new trunk road since we took office, and 350 schemes are in the pipeline. I assure my hon. Friend that the highest priority is given to that by the Government.

Rural Areas

3. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received concerning the availability of transport in rural areas.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): A number of representations were received when bus deregulation was proposed, but very few recently, as operators and local authorities have taken up the opportunities provided under the Transport Act 1985.

Mr. Taylor: I previously asked the Minister when the Government would make their response to the third report of the Select Committee on Transport on the financing of rail services. Can he now say when that response will be made? Will he seek time in the House to debate the conclusions of that report, with particular reference to local control of rail services in places such as Cornwall?

Mr. Mitchell: We expect to make a considered response to the Select Committee's report shortly. It would be quite wrong for me to speculate today in advance of doing so.

Mr. Harris: Does my hon. Friend agree that the introduction of the Transport Act 1985 has been a success in Cornwall? Will he take particular note of the extreme difficulty that has arisen in that county as a result of the crass decision by the Cornwall and Isles of Scilly health authority to abolish completely the hospital car service? Will my hon. Friend have discussions with the Development Commission to ensure that a grant is made from the rural development fund to the new voluntary car service, Medilink, so that it can help fill that gap?

Mr. Mitchell: I am aware that the hospital car service has been withdrawn. I understand that the county council is waiting to see whether any commercial service is put forward. Of course, the council has powers to subsidise such a service if it deems that to be right and proper. There is also, as my hon. Friend said, the opportunity of using part of the £1 million a year that the Department of Transport has given to the Development Commission for this sort of purpose.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

"Spycatcher"

27. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Attorney-General whether it is intended to take any further measures against the publication of the book by Mr. Peter Wright entitled "Spycatcher" and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): Our litigation in Australia, New Zealand, Hong Kong and this country is continuing.

Mr. Winnick: Will 1988 see the end of all the ludicrous measures taken by the Government over "Spycatcher", and the restrictive measures taken against the media in this country that want to report matters of genuine public interest? Does the Attorney-General, as a senior member of the Government, ever wonder whether the amount spent on this matter — £500,000, or, more likely, £750,000—could have been far better spent on ensuring that children in need could have their operations on the National Health Service without all the waiting and difficulties that such children and their parents now face?

The Attorney-General: As is now well understood, the Government's sole objective in the litigation has been to protect the lifelong duty of confidentiality owed by former members of security services to the Crown. I do not believe that the people of this country regard that as ludicrous. It is sometimes necessary to spend money to defend an important principle. I believe that the money has been well spent.

Mr. Aitken: How much money has the taxpayer had to spend so far on this litigation in international and national courts?

The Attorney-General: Approximately £500,000 has been spent, and about £78,000 on travel costs.

Mr. Fraser: Does the Attorney-General realise that if he were to apply for a legal aid certificate to continue the litigation he would probably be refused on the ground that it was a waste of public money? Now that "Spycatcher" is so freely available throughout the world and this country, why does the Attorney-General not drop these ludicrous proceedings and merely continue to obtain an account of the profits of the book? I do not believe that anyone disputes that that would be the proper course of action.

The Attorney-General: My answer to the first question is no, because the Government have been concerned to defend the principle that I have already identified this afternoon. It has already become common ground that there is a lifelong duty of confidentiality. What remains at issue is the extent of that duty and the availability of means to enforce it in certain circumstances.

As to publication elsewhere in the world, it is important to uphold the duty of confidentiality by demonstrating by an order of the court that it is not open to a former member of the security services to publish in his own country what purport to be his memoirs and to make a profit thereby.

Mr. Stanbrook: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the case of Mr. Anthony Cavendish fully justifies the Government——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not covered by this question.

Departmental Select Committees (Memoranda)

28. Mr. Allen: To ask the Attorney-General how many memoranda (a) the Law Officers and (b) the Lord Chancellor have submitted to the departmental Select Committees since 1979.

The Attorney-General: No central record is maintained in either Department of evidence submitted to departmental Select Committees. There is no record of a Law Officer having submitted such a memorandum, but on one occasion written questions which had been addressed to a Law Officer were answered by letter. Inquiries indicate that since 1979 four memoranda have been submitted by the Lord Chancellor's Department.

Mr. Allen: Why is there not a Select Committee covering the work of the Attorney-General's Department?

The Attorney-General: Because the House of Commons so decided in 1979.

Mr. Mates: Has not the action in pursuing the "Spycatcher" saga been entirely justified by the subsequent——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That relates to the previous question. We are now on question 28.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has the Attorney-General's Department never submitted a memorandum on the operation of the Official Secrets Act? Does it intend in the near future to submit a memorandum on the operation of that Act? Prior to the debate on Friday, can we expect a statement on the Government's proposals for reform of that legislation?

The Attorney-General: The answer to the first two questions is no. The answer to the third question is that that is a matter for the Home Secretary.

Family Court

29. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Attorney-General when he expects to bring forward his proposals for a family court.

The Attorney-General: The Government are concerned to achieve the best possible arrangements for dealing with family business in the courts. Consideration is being given to the options in the light of consultation and further information that is being obtained. Ministers will not be in a position to take decisions until this work is complete.

Mrs. Bottomley: Has my right hon. and learned Friend had time to study the remarks by Sir John Arnold, on his retirement as president of the High Court family division, that he could see no such inevitable substantial increase in public spending on the introduction of a family court that could justify its delay on fiscal grounds? If my right hon. and learned Friend is considering cost, will he also consider the potential savings on supplementary benefit and legal aid that would be made by the introduction of a comprehensive conciliation service? Above all, will he consider the saving in human misery that will be made when we put an end to our outdated, incoherent and overadversarial court system?

The Attorney-General: I share my hon. Friend's great respect for the former president of the family division. Of course costs have to be considered when reflecting upon any means of improving our present system, which is indeed, open to criticism, as I know my hon. Friend believes. All the options are being considered. I shall, of course, draw to the attention of my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor the contribution that my hon. Friend has just made.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman call to his noble Friend's attention the problems that currently arise, sometimes with great injustice, in connection with legal aid? Will he especially mention to him that wives receiving voluntary maintenance have it counted as part of their income, even if it is payable to the children? Will he ask his noble Friend to bear in mind the legal aid position in reviewing the whole family court system?

The Attorney-General: Yes.

Mr. Sims: Does my right hon. and learned Friend recall that in 1974 the Finer committee recommended the establishment of a family court, that in October 1986 the Government asked for comments on that consultation paper, and that nothing further has happened? Does he appreciate that some of us who favour the introduction of family courts feel that the Government's policy on this issue is one of procrastination?

The Attorney-General: I am quite satisfied that there is no dragging of feet. As my hon. Friend, with his experience in these matters, will know, the matter is complex. A great deal is going on in the Lord Chancellor's Department. The civil justice review bears upon this and there is a degree of overlap with other matters that are being considered for innovation and reform. Ministers have asked for further information following the report of the interdepartmental committee, and as soon as he can my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor will put forward recommendations for the decision of his colleagues. I cannot give a date for that but we wish to do that as soon as possible.

State Security

32. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the outcome of his correspondence with the BBC concerning security-related matters.

The Attorney-General: The suggestion contained in my letter of 4 December to the deputy director-general of the BBC remains open.

Mr. Dalyell: What was wrong with the D-notice procedure that it was not used?

The Attorney-General: Nothing was wrong with the D-notice procedure.

Mr. Aitken: If there was nothing wrong with the D-notice procedure, will my right hon. and learned Friend tell us whether he was in correspondence or communication with the secretary or any other official of the D-Notice committee, prior to issuing his large number of injunctions?

The Attorney-General: The D-notice procedure relates to matters that the Government consider to be sensitive from the security point of view, and those are identified by D-notices which are published. The D-Notice committee is not concerned with and no D-notice bears upon the preservation of the duty of confidentiality which is owed. I have had no correspondence with the secretary of the D-Notice committee.

Mr. Beith: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman is satisfied that there is nothing wrong with the D-notice procedure, what will he say to those who have to operate it—the editors, upon whose co-operation it depends? Is it not clear that the D-notice procedure is one of the many casualties of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's rush to go into the courts about these matters?

The Attorney-General: I think not. The D-Notice committee is a non-statutory body responsible jointly to the Secretary of State for Defence through the permanent secretary and to the media through a representative. It deals with those matters which I have identified. The duty of confidentiality which is owed by former members of the security services is an obligation of a civil nature owed to the Crown, and the Crown therefore has to take such steps in the courts as it thinks appropriate to enforce that duty.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the unsatisfactory nature of that reply, I beg to give notice that I shall seek to raise this matter on the Adjournment at the earliest possible opportunity.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

33. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the amount of assistance being given to Ethiopia.

34. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a further statement on the British contribution to alleviating famine in Ethiopia.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Chris Patten): I returned yesterday from a visit to Ethiopia. I believe that our response to the emergency has been generous, but a sustained effort by the Ethiopian Government, donors and voluntary organisations will continue to be needed this year. In the course of my visit I therefore announced the allocation of an additional 40,000 tonnes of food aid, which we will deliver in the coming months. This will be channelled through international and voluntary agencies.

With this allocation our contribution to the food aid needs of the Ethiopian people totals 94,500 tonnes, and the overall cost of our assistance, including our share of European Community relief programmes, totals some £35 million since the beginning of last year.

We will continue to monitor the situation closely, and will consider if there is more that we should do.

Mr. Marshall: Will my hon. Friend tell the House how the assistance given by the United Kingdom and other European Community states compares with that given by the Soviet Union to its client state, Ethiopia? Will he also tell the House whether, during his recent visit to Ethiopia, he was able to raise with the Government the matter of human rights in that country?

Mr. Patten: On the first point, we have so far pledged 94,500 tonnes of food aid. As I understand it, the Soviet Union has so far committed itself to providing 2,500 tonnes of rice to Ethiopia. The European Community has pledged over 200,000 tonnes of food aid to Ethiopia. Those figures speak for themselves. I do not have the figures for armaments.

On the second point, I raised the issue of human rights in a discussion with the deputy Prime Minister of Ethiopia. I also referred to political prisoners and, in particular, to the imprisonment of members of the royal family.

Mr. Bruce: On his visit to Ethiopia, was my hon. Friend able to assess the harm done to the aid programme by the continuing war? Was he able to gauge whether there are any moves to bring peace to that troubled land?

Mr. Patten: It is extremely difficult to run a relief operation of the size required in Ethiopia in any circumstances. It is clearly even more difficult in the circumstances of war. The main threat over the next few months will come from the security situation. We should be able to get food to Ethiopia in sufficient quantities and to deal with the other logistical problems, but there is a real worry that we may not be able to truck food around Ethiopia. The European Community has called for peace in the Horn of Africa. That would be the best way of securing development in that region.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the Minister accept that it was a great surprise to many people in the West that famine again broke out in Ethiopia? Does he also accept that the only way of securing long-term prevention of famine is by long-term development aid? Will the Minister tell the House why that aid has been blocked until now and why even voluntary agencies have not been able to use Government funds for their food projects in Ethiopia?

Mr. Patten: The major reason for the present situation in Ethiopia is that it has not rained. That is the reason for the crop failures in Eritrea and Tigre. We and other donors have drawn a legitimate distinction between humanitarian assistance and long-term development assistance. There is no point in long-term development assistance unless one supports effective and sensible policies, as other donors such as the Swedes would argue. I hope that the Ethiopian Government are now changing their agricultural policies. That would be in the interests of the Ethiopian people and would unlock a considerable amount of development assistance from the European Community, the World Bank and other donors.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Is the Minister aware that, just a few days ago, Moira Hart, the UNICEF emergency relief officer, was able to show me a list of donor contributions to the specific UNICEF appeal for emergency aid? Although that list covers contributions from countries such as the United States and the Republic of Ireland, there is a significant absence of any contribution from Great Britain. From his own experience, does the Minister accept that the need for non-food aid is outstanding and urgent? Therefore, will he explain to the House why there is such an omission?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman will have heard me say earlier that so far this country has contributed about £35 million in humanitarian assistance to Ethiopia. We have done as much as anyone, and more than most. We shall, of course, continue to keep other appeals under consideration, and we shall provide resources to them when we think that it is right and necessary to do so.

Sub-Saharan Africa

35. Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on initiatives arising from the World Bank meeting on 3 December to discuss help for the poorest and most heavily indebted countries in sub-Saharan Africa.

Mr. Chris Patten: The meting identified substantial aid resources available from Western donor countries for co-ordinated support for structural adjustment programmes in poor sub-Saharan African countries with debt problems. Her Majesty's Government stated that they expect to commit about £250 million of programme aid over the next three years to the target countries. Total pledges at the World Bank meeting amounted to $6·4 billion. In addition, the World Bank expects to commit $6·2 billion to the special programme of assistance from the eighth replenishment of the International Development Association.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: My hon. Friend has set out a most welcome and substantial package. Will he tell us something more about the effect of long-term debt on such countries, and particularly what sums may have been written off? Although we cannot always protect people from their own folly, is there some way in which we can break the cycle of debt and trouble?

Mr. Patten: The best way of breaking the cycle to which my hon. Friend referred is to make progress in implementing the Chancellor's important debt initiative for the most debt-distressed African countries. That initiative has been widely welcomed and was endorsed at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meting and by Commonwealth Finance Ministers. Another way of breaking the cycle is for debt-distressed countries to pursue the sort of policy reforms that are already being sucessfully implemented by several African countries.

Mr. Spearing: Is it not equally important to ensure that such malevolent cycles do not recur? What sort of terms are being planned for the £6,000 million replenishment that the Minister has mentioned? Is i essential that the return on such capital lending shou within the resources of the country and, in partic should not be prejudicial to the poorest people in country, whom such loans are originally meant to be

Mr. Patten: Of course, it is essential that the t should be such as can be managed by the po countries. The terms that are offered by the IDA extremely soft. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman know about the increase in the IMF structural adjust facility. He may also know that, a few weeks ago, Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that we intending to subsidise a lending equivalent of £750 mi under the structural adjustment facility. That covers r than one sixth of the total new lending. It is not per surprising that that was welcomed by the mana director of the IMF as a remarkable contribution.

Black South Africans

36. Mr. Stanbrook: To ask the Secretary of State Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will ma statement about the training being provided under the programme for black South Africans.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Overseas Developr Administration is providing 330 study places for b South Africans in Britain and South Africa at a co £2·1 million in the present financial year. We expec provide 490 places in the next financial year. We bel this assistance will make a positive contribution peaceful change and development in South Africa.

Mr. Stanbrook: Sooner or later, many suit qualified and experienced Africans will be required to the senior posts in the economy and government of So Africa. What discussions have been held with the fr line states and other states in Africa, such as Nig about providing appropriate training for Africans f South Africa for this eventuality?

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is entirely right. Tha one reason why we have increased our expenditure on for training and education of black South Africans f just over £500,000 in 1984-85 to almost £3 million in current financial year. I hope to be able to discuss the i raised by my hon. Friend when I attend the meeting of Southern African development co-ordination confere in Arusha later this month.

Britoil

3.31 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East) (by private notice): To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on how he intends to use the Government's special share in Britoil to preserve the independence of the company.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): The powers of the special share are set out in article 71 of Britoil's articles of association.

On 18 December the Treasury put out a press statement, stating that in present circumstances the Government intend to use their special share in Britoil to prevent any bidder from gaining control of the Britoil board.

The statement went on to explain that, if and when a formal offer is made for, or control obtained of, more than 50 per cent. of Britoil's shares, paragraph 71C of the articles of association will come into effect. This allows the special shareholder to outvote all other shareholders at a general meeting on any resolution. It also allows the special shareholder to require an extraordinary general meeting. This was reaffirmed on 23 December, in the light of the statement that day by the Panel on Takeovers and Mergers about the proposed BP offer for Britoil.

No such offer has yet been made. But, whatever the circumstances, I can assure the House that the powers of the special share will be used for so long as it is in the national interest to do so.

I cannot add anything more at this stage.

Mr. Smith: The Chancellor will be aware of the widespread concern, particularly among the management and employees of Britoil, that it is well known that British Petroleum wishes to take over the company. The Chancellor's statement that he would use the golden share did not seem to act as "a formidable deterrent", as the right hon. Gentleman predicted the golden share would on a previous occasion in the House. BP seems determined to proceed with its bid.

Would it not make matters much clearer if the Chancellor were to make it clear that the purpose of the golden share is, as he has told the House on a number of occasions, to deter a bid for Britoil, rather than to in some way modify the consequences of the takeover, as BP seems to imagine it might be? I invite the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make it clear that Britoil will be maintained as an independent company, with its corporate headquarters in Glasgow, and that the fundamental basis of the golden share will be maintained, whatever bids are forthcoming in the next few days.

Mr. Lawson: I have nothing to add to what I have said. This is a highly market-sensitive matter and it would not be proper for me to say anything further. I add that I do not think that this line of questioning—although I do not dispute the right hon. and learned Gentleman's right to ask the questions if he wishes to do so—is helpful to Britoil.

The location of the headquarters of Britoil is, of course, a matter for the Britoil board, as it has always been.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Following what my right hon. Friend said about the headquarters in Glasgow and the facilities in Aberdeen, is it not in the national interest that they should remain where they are?

Mr. Lawson: I note what my hon. Friend has said, I repeat what I said a moment or two ago, that the loca of the headquarters of the company is a matter for board, as it has always been. The special share ensures independence of the board.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): The Chancell statement is welcome as far as it goes, but it does no very far, because it contains certain qualifications. Wi give an assurance that neither now, in this "mar sensitive period", as he calls it, nor later will he tell Bri Petroleum that if it gains control of the company's sh he will somehow allow his present powers to lapse, perh after a period? We want an absolute assurance that will not happen and that Britoil will be maintained a independent company.

Mr. Lawson: As I have already said, whether to use share is a matter about which the Government will h to make up their mind in the light of the circumstance the time and in the overriding light of the national inte I have said that in the present circumstances we will it.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): As the Chance of the Exchequer, rightly or wrongly, has been sadd with this very controversial, but highly undemocra power, would it be sensitive to the national interest for to seek the views of those bidding for Britoil as to whe they intend to support regional development and main the centre of the company in Glasgow?

Mr. Lawson: Any company interested in acqui Britoil is perfectly free to reveal its intentions on matter.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): Will the Chance give a clear and unequivocal pledge to use the golden sh to protect the independence of Britoil, so that that is c in Hansard? May I encourage him to fulfil that pledge assure us that if there is a change in that commitment th will be a full debate and vote in the House on a matte such great importance to the Scottish economy?

Mr. Lawson: I cannot give any assurance abou debate—that is not a matter for me—but when I Secretary of State for Energy in 1982 and this special sh was set up, I gave a pledge that if and when the share w to be redeemed, the House would be informed first.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Does my right h Friend agree that raising this matter by means of a priv notice question is of no help whatever to Britoil and likely to be of advantage, only to, and in the interests a predator?

Mr. Lawson: That may be the case.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): This is first time that I have witnessed the legendary arroga and complacency of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough a Saddleworth): The hon. Gentleman should be here m often—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Galloway: It is not a pretty sight. The Chancello answer to an earlier question about the siting of Brito headquarters was staggering in its indifference. In constituency, where the headquarters are situated, there are 800 people—Government Members may laugh like buffoons—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should not use language like that.

Mr. Galloway: I apologise, Mr. Speaker. These 800 people are very worried and frightened about their future, yet all the Chancellor can say is that it is somehow a matter for the market place or the company to decide. Can the Chancellor find it within himself to assure my constituents and the people of Glasgow that he wants the headquarters of Britoil to remain there, and that he wants Britoil to remain an independent company?

Mr. Lawson: I welcome the hon. Gentleman on one of his infrequent visits to the House. Had he listened, he would have heard me say that the location of the company's headquarters is a matter for the board, as it always has been. When Britoil was formed from the old British National Oil Corporation, the board decided to locate its headquarters in Glasgow and, as the hon. Gentleman will know, it built a spanking new building to house those headquarters. That is where they remain to this day.

The board has unusual powers. That is why the power of the special share to control the board is especially interesting. Article 92 of the Britoil articles of association states:

"The business of the company shall be managed by the directors to the exclusion of the company in general meeting."

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is already large and welcome foreign investment in North sea oil, but that it would cause concern if companies such as Britoil and British Petroleum were to fall under foreign control, with the result that almost all the strategic qualities of North sea oil would be controlled by foreign interests? Does he agree that any such foreign bid for Britoil or BP would be stoutly resisted, under the provisions of the Industry Act 1975, in the best interests of this country?

Mr. Lawson: As I made clear in 1982 when I was Secretary of State for Energy, the purpose of the special share in Britoil is to ensure that control over the company does not fall into unacceptable hands. As for BP, my hon. Friend will be aware of the assurances that we have received from the Kuwaitis.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Given the Chancellor's welcome confirmation of the Treasury's position on this issue, will he confirm that he does not agree with the criticism that has been made against Britoil—unfairly, in many people's eyes—that it is using tactics to try to increase the share offer from about 450p to 600p? Is that not an unfair allegation against the company?

Mr. Lawson: It would be wrong for me to venture into those waters, but I have noted what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the golden share in Enterprise Oil has a life of five years? Why should Britoil be tre differently from Enterprise Oil? As my right hon. Fri is a believer in free markets, will he tell us how the gol share will encourage Britoil to become more efficient is to be protected by a share structure as antiquated as of the Savoy.

Mr. Lawson: It is not all that antiquated. It intr[illegible]oduced only in 1982. However, I feel much older that I did then—perhaps I am. My hon. Friend is ri to point to the fact that some golden shares are ti limited, whereas others are not. I read in the newspap today that the Britoil board envisages the day when gold[illegible]n share in Britoil will no longer exist.

M[illegible]. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is not need[illegible]o act reinforced by the news that the Kuwaitis buyi[illegible] BP shares and now have 18 per cent. of them if not true that the Kuwaitis have refused to give undertaking that they will not purchase 29·9 per cent the company? Is there not a danger that the Arabs mi pick up a large section of North sea oil on the cheap?

Mr. Lawson: There is nothing to stop someone buy shares cheaply after a fall on the stock market. The h Gentleman must be aware of the assurances given by Kuwaitis that they are not seeking control over company or the management. It would be inconsist with those assurances if they acquired a shareholding 29·9 per cent.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Will my ri hon. Friend clarify what he means by his frequ references to the "national interest"? Does he me Scotland's national interest, or is he concentrating Britain's national interest? If it is the latter, what differe can it make whether the oilfields are owned by Brit Petroleum or by Britoil?

Mr. Lawson: I am the Chancellor of the Exchequer the United Kingdom and a member of the Government the United Kingdom, and it is therefore the natio interest of the United Kingdom about which I speaking. However, obviously that does not mean tha would be indifferent to the views of Scottish Members

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): May we ta it from the Chancellor's reply that, as the inventor of golden share, he intends to use it to keep Britoil as independent company? Given the sensitivity of the mark should he not, in all fairness, convey that to the chairm of BP, Sir Peter Walters, as soon as possible, with backing of all the legal opinion that he can muster?

Mr. Lawson: Britoil has, of course, been independe since it was floated more than five years ago. Article 7 explicitly envisages the possibility of a bidder acquiri more than 50 per cent. of the shares and states in the circumstances what the powers of the special share are have nothing to add to that.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret that I have not been a to call all those hon. Members wishing to speak. This an extension of Question Time. We have another priva notice question.

Arab-Israel Question

3.45 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on British policy on the Arab-Israel question in the light of recent developments on the West Bank and Gaza.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Mellor): The current unrest underlines the urgent need for progress towards a settlement. We shall continue to work for an international conference as the framework for negotiations between the parties directly concerned.

Mr. Kaufman: Is the Minister aware that when I left Israel this morning the grim news was of still more disturbances, killings of Palestinians by Israeli forces and the clubbing of women demonstrators in east Jerusalem? Does he agree with me that, after 20 years of deprivation of civil rights under military rule, the patience of the Palestinians in the occupied territories has finally snapped and that, while the Israeli preoccupation with national security is understandable and accepted, no military response will put an end to the Palestinians' grievances, and neither will the deportation of individual Palestinians?

Is the hon. and learned Gentleman aware that in the past few days, King Hussein of Jordan, the Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister of Jordan, the Foreign Minister and the Defence Minister of Israel and Palestinian activists in the West Bank and Gaza, while offering differing interpretations and suggesting their own possible solutions, told me that disturbances will continue until there is a negotiated settlement stemming from an international conference convened under the auspices of the United Nations with the twin objectives of security for Israel and self-determination for the Palestinians? That point of view has been echoed to me by individual demonstrators—both women and youth—to whom I have talked.

Is the Minister aware that the main obstacles to the convening of an international conference are the obduracy and inflexibility of the Prime Minister of Israel, who is at odds with his own Foreign Minister on this issue, and that the continuing inertia of the United States Administration is contributing to the problem instead of helping to find a solution? Will the Government now consider whether an initiative from Britain can seek to end the stalemate so that, as so many have told me is their wish, in Jordan, Palestine and Israel, Jews and Arabs, Israelis and Palestinians, can try to live together in peace instead of being locked in conflict?

Mr. Mellor: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his remarks and commend him on his visit, which was enormously helpful. It is clear that what he has said about the situation in the West Bank and Gaza—both today and in his article in The Observer—is entirely correct. A deep and desperate problem now faces the Government of Israel in finding the way forward. It is crucial that there should be widespread recognition throughout Israel—regardless of party—that the present situation cannot continue and that security cannot be maintained at the point of a gun. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said last October, the effect of that brutalise those involved, which, in the long run, si builds up more problems.

We believe, as the right hon. Gentleman has asse that there is an opportunity for an internat conference, under the auspices of the five perma members of the Security Council, within which ser discussions can take place between all the parties ways in which, in response to a genuine willingness t the occupation and allow the self-determination o Palestinian people, the state of Israel can have that precious thing, as we would see it—recognition b neighbours of its right to exist behind secure bound

We can none of us choose our neighbours, wheth our private lives or as nations, but it is absolutely fundamentally clear that long-term security canno maintained at the point of a gun and that, having re to the nature of the leadership of most of the neighbo countries, there is now an opportunity for a long solution to be found. In the first instance, however, a right hon. Gentleman has said, that will require movement from certain factions within the I Government.

I make two further points to the right hon. Gentle First, I am glad that he found his discussions with Jo so fruitful, as indeed do the Government. It is clear on the Arab side, as on the Israeli side, there is a le to live down. It is also clear that all who wish to play a in the process must legitimise themselves. At this there is a particular responsibility on the PLO to accep two relevant Security Council resolutions, Nos. 242 338, and to renounce violence to give effect to its pl and commitment that it is the representative of Palestinian people, and it will not be brought into framework unless it is prepared to do that.

As for the British position, we shall continue to d that we can to use our historic patterns of friendship all parties in the region to try to advocate that cause. genuinely delighted, as I am sure the whole House is, whatever issues may divide the House on party lines is not one of them.

Mr. John Biffen (Shropshire, North): Is my hon. learned Friend aware that then he went to Gaza undertook a difficult task and did it well?

Mr. Mellor: I am most grateful to my right hon. Fri

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Would it b order, Mr. Speaker, for me to congratulate my right and admirable Friend the Member for Manche Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) on the courage and vision o statement today and to couple that with congratulat to the Minister of State on his courage and vision in v he said and how he conducted himself while he was in middle east?

Is it not time that the international community, particularly the EEC, started to exert economic pres on the Fascist Government of Israel to make them rest their policies and in particular the activities of some of assorted thugs from Poland and America who have b misbehaving within the Israeli army?

Mr. Mellor: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman fo words of commendation, but I cannot agree with prescription. It is clearly the duty of the en international community, whether through the Europ

[Mr. Mellor]

Community or through the United Nations, to make our views on the situation known, because the occupied territories are exactly that: they are not part of Israel, but, as the international community says, are administered in accordance with international law. Every effort must be made through every convenient forum to make all parties appreciate the need at this time to lay aside some of the burdens of the past and to try to work for a better future. We have already explored ways in which both sides could do that.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Does my hon. and learned Friend accept that the many hon. Members who, like himself, have seen what is happening in Gaza, unlike the writers of the more spectacular editorials of the past few days, totally endorse his remarks? Does my hon. and learned Friend accept that, where an even-handed approach between tyranny—I think that that was my hon. and learned Friend's word—and the oppressed secures no result, the time has come to speak more in favour of the oppressed than of the oppressor? Will he tell the Israeli Government that if they go ahead with their totally illegal proposal to deport Palestinians from their homeland, the British Government, with others in the European Community, will see to it that the economic advantages to trade that Israel enjoys with the European Community will cease?

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend is unquestionably right to condemn the deportations. They are illegal under international law, and, what is more, they are counter-productive in their practical effect. They will only create martyrs and make a difficult situation even worse. I hope that the Government of Israel will pay heed to what the United Nations has asked and suspend the policy of deportations.

On my hon. Friend's comments about the West Bank and Gaza, it is impossible to understand the full dimensions of that situation without going there. Going to the West Bank and especially to Gaza is a deep shock. It is clear that the people there wish to have some hope for the future. However, such hope for the future will come only if two things take place: first, recognition by the Government of Israel that the status quo is not an option — it is unacceptable and cannot continue — and, secondly, that those who purport — some from a considerable distance from the West Bank and Gaza— to be the spokesmen of the people there should, by renouncing violence and accepting Israel's right to exist, bring themselves into a position such that they can play a proper and positive part in the framework of discussions that we are trying to establish.

I know that my hon Friend has ploughed a lonely and brave furrow in some of the discussions that he has had with groups in the region. I hope that he will impress upon them that statesmanship is looked for from both sides, not just from one.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I make a plea for brief questions and answers, because time is moving on?

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): I should like to express my own sorrow at the loss of life and the casualties in recent events and my hope that the parties will live together in peace. However, regretfully, I shoul that I trust that in retrospect the Minister will that his tactics and lack of tact, his lang behaviour, were unworthy and unhelpful to [Interruption.] They assisted only the extremis sides and did not assist Britain's prospects of useful role, as we would wish, in bringing the together.

Mr. Mellor: I know that the hon. an Gentleman speaks with sincerity. However, he h response from the House and does not need response from me.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Is my hon. ar Friend aware that, at the very moment when Gaza, the President of the state of Israel w international parliamentarians that relations be country and Israel had never been so close dur years since independence as now, under the pres Minister? Is it not obvious that the Israelis will 650,000 disaffected Arabs in their territories? Th is that no other Arab country wants Gaza o responsibility for its people.

Is it not a fact that the state of Israel is d anxious for a peaceful settlement but that no Ar of any responsibility, dares to come forward peace, boundaries and the future of Gaza with th

Mr. Mellor: I appreciate that my hon. an Friend speaks with great sincerity and awaren situation. However, I must point out that if t Government were full-heartedly to accept an inte conference, they would not find their Arab n unwilling to participate. I made it clear earlie happy to reiterate it for my hon. Friend's ben if progress is to be made, it will require efforts sides. I have sought to set out—I shall not rep few of our ideas about what is required.

However, my hon. and learned Friend s disabused of one idea. He seems to suggest tha willing to give up Gaza—[Interruption.] I mu my hon. and learned Friend that one section of t Government may be willing to give up Gaza, but Minister, Mr. Shamir, travelled to Gaza last year the opportunity of his brief visit to say that Ga of Israel and is not negotiable

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bern Does the Minister accept that, although his re Gaza was understandable and, in many circums be welcomed, there is, as I found this new year o visit to Israel and the West Bank, a growing peace now among the Jewish community? responsibility of the Government is to encou enlightened members of the majority community to put pressure on their politicians and leaders so may achieve peace. That view is growing and is wi among the military and others, who are w recognise the independence of Palestine so lon have security for Israel.

Mr. Mellor: What the hon. Gentleman says is must remember that Israel is the middle e democracy and that this is essentially a battle for and minds of the Israeli voters. I hope that the p re-evaluation which many people in this country to go through when watching their television screens during the past five or six weeks will also be happening in Israel.

It is important that the peace process, through the framework of the international conference, which seems to command wide support on both sides of the House, should be seen as an opportunity, not a threat, for Israeli's security needs to be recognised. For example, there is no reason why Israel's giving up of the occupied territories would mean that hostile armour would have to be replaced in the occupied territories or why a demilitarised solution should not be found. Clearly, there can be a way forward only if people are prepared to enter the process in the first place. Until then, I fear that we can see only all the problems of an area in limbo, which is what we see in the occupied territories at present.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Since the people in Israeli-occupied Egypt and Jordan have been denied for two decades any form of democratic institution, such as we enjoy, does my hon. and learned Friend agree that unless those visiting those territories, as he did, speak out, as he did, there will be no voices to be heard speaking out clearly and sincerely as the alternative to violence? Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that speaking out openly is the only alternative to violence? I hope that all hon. Members back that alternative.

Mr. Mellor: I am particularly grateful to my hon. Friend as his warm private letter was the first I read when I returned from Israel. I am grateful to him for his message. One of the false hares that is around is the idea that somehow one makes matters better by not speaking out about them. I believe that it assists the process of drift and postpones the evil time when a decision must be taken if people, particularly friends, are not prepared to speak out and to say with candour what it is after all our duty as friends to say. I hope that this will be seen positively, as the whole international community sees it, not as a threat to Israel, because that is certainly not how it is interpreted.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must draw the attention of the House to the futher statement and important business before us. I shall allow two more questions.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): In rela international conference, could the Minist whether the Government, or any membe Government, have been in touch with the Ur since his visit?

Mr. Mellor: There is regular contact with States, and obviously it is crucial that all five members of the Security Council should play t have no doubt that the United States woul prepared to do that. Naturally, in a complicate there will always be discussions and inevitable of view on precisely the right framework. It r view, and we give it to all parties, whether members of the Security Council or countries in that the international conference is the only t option at present. We shall continue to advocat with all the more enthusiasm because it appear view expressed by the House this afternoon an occasions.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): While r be happy with living conditions in the Gaza stri hon. and learned Friend accept that, in cont Egyptians, over the past 20 years the Israelis ha rehouse thousands of people there? Is there r measure of hypocrisy, particularly in the Unite which, on the one hand, condemns what is goin Gaza Strip, yet condemns Israel for trying t refugees?

Mr. Mellor: I understand why my hon. Frie as he does, but the amount of effort that has b in the occupied territories on improving the qua of the people has been extremely limited and fall of what is needed. Indeed, I am sad to say th much attention has been paid to investing settlements in the occupied territories which on difficult situation worse. I do not know whethe Friend has had the advantage of visiting the territories, but I invite him to do so and to see f the miserable conditions which, once seen, memory.

Upholstered Furniture (Fire Resistance)

4.4 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Francis Maude): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the fire resistance of domestic upholstered furniture.

It is estimated that 90 per cent. of furniture on sale to the public is filled with polyurethane foam. The increasing use of this relatively cheap material since the 1950s has brought comfortable, upholstered furniture within the reach of many people who could not previously afford it.

There has been concern for some 20 years about its fire safety. In 1980 the Government introduced the Upholstered Furniture (Safety) Regulations, which require all domestic upholstered furniture to resist ignition by a smouldering cigarette. Since well over half of all furniture fires are started by cigarettes, this measure addressed the principal problem. This was then, and remains, the strictest fire safety regime in the world. Ireland is the only other European country with any legal controls over the fire safety of furniture.

However, concern has remained. The present regulations certainly improved ignition resistance — that is, that furniture became more difficult to set on fire—but the nature of the foam in widespread use is that once lit it burns with immense ferocity and speed, generating exceptional heat and emitting toxic fumes. Notwithstanding its fire performance, its comfort and low cost have made foam-filled furniture extremely popular with customers. Therefore, Governments over many years have consistently been reluctant to prohibit its use in the absence of reasonably priced, safer alternatives. Recent developments have altered this.

In July 1987 I issued for consultation a set of documents describing measures to improve significantly our already high level of protection. We received many responses, most of which expressed support for the principle of basing the regulations on a code of practice. Different views were expressed about the content of the code of practice and about how quickly new regulations could or should be introduced. I am grateful to all those who responded.

Public attention has been focused on this issue by the spate of tragic deaths in house fires over the holiday period, and I know that the whole House will join me in expressing sympathy for the bereaved families. Some of the fires involved foam-filled furniture. It has not been possible to ascertain whether such furniture pre-dated the implementation of the present regulations in 1982, but in view of the widespread concern, I thought it right to inform the House at the earliest opportunity of the Government's intentions.

It is my intention that the regulations will make it illegal to use standard quality foam under any grade of cover from the end of February 1989. There has been some debate about the fire-resistance qualities of high-resilience foam. I am satisfied that it provides better protection than standard foam, in that it is less easily ignited, but once lit it burns in much the same way as standard foam. Therefore, I am not satisfied that the advantages that high resilience foam carries over standard foam are enough to justify its continued use. Accordingly, the regulations will outlaw its use from the same date. Combustion-modified high-resilience foam will therefore be the o foam from that time. This material has developed and was commercially launched It ignites more slowly and gives off fewer fu foams in common use. Therefore, it is r experts as providing greatly superior fire re

As far as covering materials are conce concluded that we should eventually requir meet the match ignition test. This will be a from the end of February 1990.

These regulations will be made under t Protection Act 1987, which prescribes penalt up to £2,000 and imprisonment of up to si both, for each offence. Local authority tradi officers are responsible for enforcement an fully consulted. The classification of compon of practice basis of the new regulations wil substantially easier than the present law effectively. The code of practice will also hav of flexibility. If and when new materials or of materials are developed, the code will ena choice to be widened, while maintaining safe

I understand that representatives of chie have suggested a ban on standard and h polyurethane foam from 1 January 1989, months earlier than the date that I have ann not believe that that earlier date is feasible. introducing a legal requirement earlier than meet would be to interrupt the supply of fu public and to put at risk the 35,000 or mo manufacture of components and in the man distribution of finished furniture, but because public concern on this issue businesses will much more quickly than they consider acce to issue the regulations in draft at the end o By the end of February next year it will be furniture filled with standard or high-resilien by a year later, the end of February 1990, materials for upholstered furniture will hav match test.

These new regulations will ensure that furniture sold in future will be substantially present. However, this can be achieved on which must eventually be paid by the custom of the additional cost vary, but I am confi keen competition that exists in the furniture t them to a minimum.

There will remain for some years in furniture bought before even the present reg into force in 1982, and no new regulations that. Nor will furniture meeting these standards be entirely safe. It remains essent for every householder to exercise the utmos prevent fires from starting in the first place does start, the safety of the occupiers will b a smoke detector is installed. These are n inexpensive, retailing at some £10 to £15, a advise their installation.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): I join th expressing deep sympathy to the relatives died so tragically in the spate of fires over C the new year.

I welcome, with significant qualificat statement, which surely marks as profound a climbdown as has ever been made in con

I pay tribute to the campaign that has been vigorously waged by many people, including chief fire officers, who had the courage to speak out when they might have remained silent.

Am I right in saying that the effect of today's statement is that all standard polyurethane foam is to go within a period of 14 months, contrary to the Minister's original proposals, which allowed it to be used for three years, that high-resilience foam is to go altogether, contrary to the previous proposals, which allowed it to be used indefinitely, and that ignitable covers are to go altogether after two years, contrary to the proposals that allowed them to be used indefinitely? Am I right in saying that the effect of these changes will be that after two years there should be only safe foam filling within fire-resistant covers and that any combinations of covers and filling should pass the full British Standards Institution 5852 test? Chief fire officers and others wanted more immediate action, and the only reason for delaying action was the difficulty experienced by the industry in gearing itself up to meet the changes.

The Minister's proposals were published on 1 July last year. Will he confirm that as long ago as 1 September 1987 the Greater Manchester fire service told him that the proposals were inherently defective because high-resilience foam had been tested and found wanting, that that view was unanimously agreed by the Chief and Assistant Chief Fire Officers Associations and that months ago, the British Standards Institution said that it was refusing a classification for those proposals?

Will the Minister also confirm that on 30 September the Crown Suppliers, the Government's own furniture suppliers, condemned the proposals in forthright terms and said that they represented simply what the furniture industry wanted, and that that was confirmed by the Home Office and the Fire Research Station? Is it not correct that the Minister's Department has known for months that those proposals were inherently defective? Only in the last two weeks, following a public outcry, has any effective action been contemplated. Will the Minister confirm that that is correct?

Will the Minister comment on what I was told today? I shall accept his assurance if he says that what I was told is incorrect. The proposals are the product of a Government working party set up by his Department. Will the Minister comment on the following information, which I was given today: that the working party included only one fire officer from anywhere in the country, that there was no representative from the Crown Suppliers, the Government's own experts, and that more than 20 representatives from the furniture trade attended the meetings of that working party? Will the Minister also comment on a specific point that was put to me today, that the minutes and reports of those meetings were drawn up by the furniture industry?

The general lesson that can be drawn from that sorry episode, no matter what welcome we give to today's proposals, is that in future, when the Department is faced with a conflict between the safety and security of millions of consumers and the commercial motives of a particular industry, it should put the public interest before vested interests, no matter how well connected.

Mr. Maude: The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) could afford to be a little more generous. He referred to the proposals as a climbdown. That is arrant nonsense. This is the first British Government to take polyurethane foam furniture. The Gover party did nothing for five years, well after the recognised, and well after public concern w When the deputy leader of the Labour party of State for Prices and Consumer Protectio over a period of glorious inaction. This Go the first to introduce measures that are the t world.

My proposals today go substantially furt Last July, proposals were issued for consulta Gentleman has gone through some of the re consultations. The purpose of consultation p hear what people have to say about them. surprise anyone that we have listened to w said. Since before mid-October people have comments which have been very helpful. Mr. Speaker: Order. I make a further p questions. We have a heavy day in front of u

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): My hon. be surprised to know that the furniture i welcome his statement. This morning I was a of the furniture industry, which thought th might be earlier than my hon. be able to produce furniture under the new regime within the time scale. They want to do so, but they are subject to the actions of the furniture manufacturers.

As the regulations will deal with coverings, will they apply to curtains, drapes, loose covers and other items within the home that use similar materials? If that is the case, it will represent a fundamental change and go far beyond what is presently expected.

Mr. Maude: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. I am delighted to hear that the furniture industry feels that it can meet the timetable. If I could be persuaded that a swifter timetable could be met, I would be delighted to alter the time scale accordingly and bring forward the date on which the regulations come into force. I am open to persuasion on that matter. The regulations will not apply to drapes, curtains and other materials. They will relate solely to upholstered furniture.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): On behalf of my party, may I also express condolences to the families who have suffered so grievously? In particular, as Welsh affairs spokesman for my party, I express sympathy for the great tragedy that occurred at Merthyr Tydfil. I am sure that you, Mr. Speaker, will call the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), and I should like to be associated with his remarks. As recommended by the fire officers, we desire that no further standard foam should be used from 1 January 1989. The welcome flexibility shown by the Minister should be implemented if the furniture industry is prepared to bring forward the date of enforcement.

The Minister should consider an educational programme for householders on fire prevention. He should publish a code that householders can put in their homes so that youngsters can learn the fire code early in their lives.

I believe that there is a conflict of interest between the Department of Trade and Industry and the Home Office over the responsibility for fire prevention. I believe that the Home Office should take over that responsibility, so that a more objective set of rules can be placed before the nation.

Mr. Maude: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks about the bereaved families. I am also grateful to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), who made similar remarks, and I am sure that the whole House shares those sentiments.

There are real problems about introducing the regulations earlier than is proposed, because there is a long lead time. The regulations will come into force and operate at the point of sale—the point at which furniture will be available in the shops for sale to the public. Obviously, manufacturers need time to adapt. The safer, combustion-modified, foam is not available in commercial quantities at the moment. Manufacturers of this foam need to gear themselves up to produce it in adequate quantities. An enormous number of suites of upholstered furniture are produced every week and the demand will be substantial. I do not believe that it would be practical to introduce the regulations earlier, but I am open to persuasion. If the industry can persuade me that it is feasible, I shall be only too glad to do so.

Mr. John Ward (Poole): I congratulat

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): The Minister's announcement represents perhaps the biggest change in policy in the eight years of this Government. On 6 October 1987, the Minister wrote to me saying that it would be wholly impracticable and undesirable if he took steps to ban the use of standard polyurethane foam, and he went on to give the reasons why. That letter was sent to me before the end of the consultation period. Unknown to me, that letter was also sent when the Minister had received from the Crown Suppliers a detailed analysis that showed that what he had said in his letter was completely at odds with the evidence provided to him. At the same time——

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. McCartney: May I just finish this point, Mr. Speaker? At the same time, the industry was trying to scupper the arrangements.

Will the Minister arrange an urgent meeting between the fire officers and the foam manufacturers to introduce a time scale that will enable the regulations to come into force by 1 January next year? The foam manufacturers have said that they could have the foam in the shops by 6 September — that was announced this morning on Thames Television.

In a debate in the summer of last year I asked the Minister seven questions in relation to the promotion of fire detectors and other measures. I ask the Minister to reconsider those matters and to introduce proposals to further the issue of fire detectors and to consider other related fire safety aspects in the home. Without those arrangements, the toll of death will continue.

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman has made a number of points. He spoke about the timing of the regulations. Some parts of the industry have suggested that the time scale could be shortened, but other parts have suggested that it is already far too short. One must try to get the balance right, because there is no benefit to the public in taking steps that require and involve the chain of supply of furniture breaking down. That would have an undesirable effect on jobs.

With regard to changes of policy, we issued consultative proposals, and we listened to what was said in response to that consultation. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will welcome that. I know that he has expressed views about several of these matters over some months. He referred to smoke detectors. They are now relatively cheap, and I hope that people will use them. However, none of those measures on its own adds up to complete safety. Even in total they do not add up to complete safety. That will continue to depend very much on the behaviour and vigilance of individuals.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): As lethal polyurethane foam has been banned from prisons, Government buildings and, indeed, airlines, I congratulate my hon. Friend on extending the ban to domestic furniture, following my Adjournment debate on that specific subject on 1 July. Britain cannot accept a death toll that results in some 300 people a year dying from domestic fires. Sections of the United Kingdom furniture industry have been dilatory and have dragged their feet on this issue. penalties that the regulations will invoke. Trading standards departments have a responsibility to enforce the present regulations, and they will have to enforce the new regulations, but they will be easier to enforce effectively than are the present regulations. It is a matter for local authorities to decide how they apportion money for their various responsibilities.

The hon. Lady referred to the extra cost of furniture. She is right. The regulations will involve an increase in the price of furniture, and there is nothing that one can do about that, although I have expressed the hope that competition will keep the extra cost to a minimum. The hon. Lady will have to raise her question about the extra burden on the social fund with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Smoke detectors are readily available and are now relatively inexpensive, costing no more than £10 or £15 each. I think that that puts them within the budget of most households.

The regulations will not apply to secondhand furniture. It would be virtually impossible to enforce a regime in that way. Sadly, it will not be possible to impose the regulations on secondhand furniture. That reinforces my point that the public must remain vigilant about that furniture, exercise great caution in buying cheap secondhand furniture, and inform themselves of its fire properties.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. In view of the pressure on business, I shall allow questions to continue until 4.45 pm; then we must move on.

Mr. Alistair Burt (Bury, North): My hon. Friend will know of my interest in the matter and my support for strengthening these regulations since the tragic death of nine people in a fire in my constituency on Christmas day 1984. In passing, it is right to pay special tribute to a man whom I met on that morning at that gutted house, Mr. Bob Graham, the assistant chief fire officer of Greater Manchester fire brigade, whose work on this issue has been significant in pressing forward with changes in the legislation. That work deserves special tribute.

I ask my hon. Friend to take most seriously the matter of smoke detectors and to consider the request made by chief officers. In particular, will my hon. Friend consider a scheme whereby the introduction of those detectors might be related to the sale of properties after an introductory date? It would be a simple way of ensuring the enforcement of the introduction of detectors. I am sure that it would be welcomed by many people, who see smoke detectors as the next stage in fire safety, without necessarily making people feel that they are safe in their house without making proper precautions against fires starting in the first place.

Mr. Maude: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the interest that he has taken in this exceedingly difficult issue over some years. I share his view about the work of Mr. Graham, the distinguished fire officer who has contributed greatly to the debate on the issue.

I shall consider my hon. Friend's suggestion on smoke detectors, but I have reservations about compulsion—requiring smoke detectors to be incorporated in homes from now on. As with any such measure, there is a serious danger that the installation of such devices could induce a sense of security which is unjustified and lead people to believe that if they have a smoke detector they do not need to worry about fire safety. None of those measures can replace the vigilance that every householder and house occupier should exercise.

Mr. Jim Callaghan (Heywood and Middleton): I welcome the Minister's statement as a move in the right direction to save lives. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman and the whole House will join me in conveying sympathy and condolences to my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd), who lost his mother in a similar fire last week. Her funeral is tomorrow.

I have in my constituency of Middleton the headquarters of an international rubber company, British Vita, which today announced that it has a new fire resistant foam, which it will now put on the market. Will the Minister contact the firm to evaluate the claims that it has made, in the hope that that can save lives?

Mr. Maude: First, of course I join the hon. Gentleman in expressing our deepest sympathy to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) for the loss that he suffered over the holiday period. All our sympathies were engaged by that tragedy.

On the other matter, I am delighted to hear what the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Mr. Callaghan) said. The impact of the announcement that I have made will be such that many parts of the industry will constructively and innovatively examine ways of increasing fire safety, and that is very much to be welcomed. I shall certainly ensure that the company that the hon. Gentleman mentioned is contacted so that we can see what it is producing.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): My hon. Friend has rightly acknowledged that many homes will continue to contain this dangerous foam furniture. I am sure that he will be just as keen to acknowledge the debt of gratitude that the whole country owes the retained fire services. Is my hon. Friend aware that the minimum training period for retained firemen, on whom rural communities such as the Isle of Wight depend so heavily, has remained unchanged for more than 30 years, at two hours a week?

Mr. Maude: My hon. Friend takes me somewhat outside the range of my responsibilities. However, I have heard his points, and no doubt the appropriate Minister will read them.

Mrs. Rosie Barnes (Greenwich): May I add my condolences to the many families that have been bereaved by domestic fires during the Christmas period? I hope that, in other instances, we shall not have quite so many sacrificial victims before action is taken.

I welcome the Minister's statement and would like to hear his comments on two aspects which I am not sure were covered by his proposed regulations. The first concerns the testing of foam in combination with fabric, simulated leather or whatever other materials are used in the construction of a piece of furniture. Such a regulation has been called for by the British Standards Institution, because a combination of ingredients can be far more flammable than any single ingredient. Will furniture be subjected to the test of a naked flame, and not only to that of the equivalent of a smouldering cigarette, which, I understand, has been the practice to date?

Mr. Maude: I shall take the hon. Lady's last point first. Yes, furniture will in future be subjected to a much stricter test than that of the smouldering cigarette. From 1990 all covering materials will be required to meet the match test, and all foams of a combustion-modified nature, which will be the only ones permissible from February next year, will have to meet the British standards test.

I am grateful to the hon. Lady for joining the rest of the House in expressing condolences, but I think that her remarks about the time that it has taken for the regulations to be introduced are a little unfair. The problem has been known for many years. This Government were the first to take any action, and for five years during the last Labour Government, when the Secretary of State for Prices and Consumer Protection was the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and the junior Minister in that Department was the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), nothing was done.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): How does my hon. Friend intend to apply these important new standards after 1992, when the internal market of the European Community is completed, bearing in mind that seven, if not eight, of the current member states have standards that are less tight than our existing ones? Is it the view of the Government, and has my hon. Friend secured the view of the Commission, that after 1992 it will still be possible for a member state to restrict imports from other member states on the basis of national safety rules and regulations?

Mr. Maude: My hon. Friend has raised a serious and important point. Before the regulations are brought into force, they must be approved by the European Commission, and it is possible for other member states to raise objections to them if they believe they will restrict the free trade in goods within the internal market: Our level of protection will be, as my hon. Friend said, substantially ahead of any in the rest of the Community. My hon. Friend has mentioned a problem that exists, and we shall have to meet it.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): What are the implications of the statement that the Minister has made for the labelling of furniture? As he will be aware, labelling is at present wholly unsatisfactory. It cannot be applied by shop assistants. They do not like it, and do not understand the red and green labelling for furniture that does, and does not, pass the match test. The labels are frequently torn off by people inspecting the furniture, and when putting them back the staff invariably put the green label —for passing the match test—only on leather furniture, and will not put it on any fabric furniture. To be on the safe side, they even put it on fabrics that pass the match test. Because of the uncertainty, they do not replace the label, when it is torn off, on any fabrics.

Will no labelling be required because all furniture will be safe in 14 months' time—or 12 months' time, if the Minister is persuaded by the comments made by some Members representing the views of the furniture manufacturing industry? Will he institute a good educational programme for shop assistants, so that they understand the real implications of the labels now in use and of those that will be used after the regulations come in?

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman is saying that the present labelling requirements have not been the success that it was hoped they would be. That was partly because the industry did not, perhaps, take the labelling initiative as seriously as it might have done, and partly because the public did not inform themselves about the labelling. Under the new regulations, because all furniture will have to meet high standards, labelling will become of less importance. However, we shall have to examine the issue to see how the new set of proposals impinges upon labelling requirements.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): The Minister will be aware that Mr. Elton, the chief fire officer of Tyre and Wear, and his colleagues, have advised that fire and smoke detector alarms should be fitted. Many of the people who die in our fires each year are elderly—the group least able to afford the alarms. Will the Minister make the money available to local authorities or voluntary organisations to enable them to fit free smoke detector alarms in the homes of all elderly pensioners who are unable to equip themselves with the apparatus?

Mr. Maude: It is broadly up to local authorities—within statutory limits—to decide how to spend the resources at their disposal. Smoke detectors, as I have said several times today, are now relatively inexpensive, and I do not believe that a price range of £10 to £15 puts them beyond the means of many households. The potential benefits in terms of fire safety make them a worthwhile investment.

D-Notice Committee

4.47 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the work of the D-Notice committee".

I have to persuade you, Mr. Speaker, that the matter is definite, urgent and important. You will have heard this afternoon, during questions to the Attorney-General, that there is considerable misunderstanding on both sides of the House—not only on the Opposition Benches, but on those of the Government—about the role of the D-Notice committee. You will have heard the gasps when the Attorney-General said that there was nothing wrong with the D-Notice committee. You will have heard the question from the hon. Member for Thanet South, (Mr. Aitken), which revealed that this is not just a single party matter.

The truth is that in recent months the D-Notice committee has been bypassed.

I must keep off the Government's reasons for having injunctions in the Scottish courts, but it will be well known that there is now a series of court activities in relation to STV, the Glasgow Herald and The Scotsman. The urgent question is whether those injunctions are legal at all. According to Professor Robert Black, a professor of Scots law, the party must be named in an interdict.

The moves against the newspapers are unprecedented——

Mr. Speaker: Order. In making his submission, the hon. Gentleman must not refer to matters currently before the courts.

Mr. Dalyell: We are in a difficult position. I recognise the difficulties involved in what is a very grey area. It is an urgent matter, but I shall leave it because in applications of this kind one must be succinct.

There can hardly be anything more important than allegations about the destabilisation of a democratically elected Government in Britain. The allegations follow the allegations by Colin Wallace and, rightly or wrongly, the allegations by a man who is very different from Mr. Peter Wright, namely, Mr. Anthony Cavendish, a thoroughly responsible source, and refer to smears on my right hon. Friend the former Prime Minister, on Ted Short and, indeed, on the leader of the Conservative party at the time, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath).

Surely nothing could be more important than to have a public inquiry into the events at the time when the former Home Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) was in office. Contrary to what has been said repeatedly on Scottish television, endorsed by the former Prime Minister, now Lord Callaghan——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has had his time.

The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing an important and specific matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the work of the D-Notice committee."

As the hon. Gentleman knows, I have to decide whether to give the matter that he has raised precedence over the business set down for today or tomorrow. I regret that I do not find that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Children's Hospital, Birmingham

4.51 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the acute problem faced by the staff of the children's hospital, Birmingham, in being able to admit children for major heart surgery."

The matter is specific in that it relates to the position at the children's hospital in Birmingham. It is certainly important in that I understand that more than 40 children in the west midlands require heart surgery at this time in this hospital. However, only five beds are in use in the intensive care unit.

As the House is no doubt aware, Matthew Collier, the four-year-old son of one of my constituents, is to be admitted today to the children's hospital. Hopefully, the operation will be carried out later this week. However, whether it will take place depends on the availability of beds in the intensive care unit. When I visited the hospital on Thursday I was shown around the intensive care unit. Only five beds are in use in that unit, which serves the whole of the west midlands. That is totally unacceptable.

It is understandable that my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Hughes) felt so strongly about this matter that he made his protest today. He wants to ensure that the child of one of his constituents is able to get the surgery performed at Birmingham children's hospital as quickly as possible.

I am sure we all hope that later this week Matthew Collier will have his heart operation, and we all wish him every success for a speedy recovery. How many other children such as Matthew in the west midlands will have to wait sometimes for weeks or months before an operation of this kind can be performed? One can imagine the constant worry of the parents.

The Prime Minister has said:

"I want an operation on the day, at the time and with the doctor that I choose."

If that is right for the Prime Minister, why should it not be right for our constituents and for their children? They should be able to have operations on the National Health Service without delay, hassle and publicity. The hospital in Birmingham does a splendid job, and it is wrong that it should have to operate on such a tight financial shoestring.

I urge you, Mr. Speaker, to grant a debate so that the acute problems faced by this hospital in being able to carry out major heart operations on children can be debated in the House. It is of far greater priority that funds should go to such hospitals than to continuing income tax cuts.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the acute problems faced by the staff of the Children's hospital, Birmingham, in being able to admit children for major heart surgery."

I listened with concern to the hon. Gentleman, but I have to give him the answer that I gave to his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). I regret that the matter that he has raised is not appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20. However, I hope that he will find other opportunities to bring the matter to the attention of the House.

Proceedings of the House

4.54 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It would be remiss if the House did not have on record what happened today during Prayers. What happened was not made known to all hon. Members and to the public at large because a decision was taken that is without precedent. I should like this to be carefully looked at. My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Hughes) raised a matter before Prayers, and in my view and in the view of other hon. Members he was dealt with in a fashion that could have been avoided. It was a secret decision because the public and the press were not present and proceedings were not being recorded by Hansard.

The matter should be carefully looked at and referred to a Committee to see whether the issue could have been dealt with in a different fashion. Many of us were of the view that my hon. Friend was trying to raise a matter of extreme importance, the one that has just been referred to, about whether——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order, but I shal deal with what the hon. Member has said. I do not know whether he was present in the Chamber at the time. I think that perhaps he was not. He should know that I did what was necessary in order to allow the House to proceed with its business. The proceedings of the suspension of the hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Hughes) will be recorded in the Votes and Proceedings and in the Official Report.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I express to you the appreciation of many Conservative Members, and I am sure of many Opposition Members for upholding the ancient and vital tradition of the House that we start our proceedings with Prayers? You did that, Mr. Speaker, even though you were under wrong pressure not to do it. Could you establish once and for all, by saying what you have demonstrated by your action, that whatever happens, Prayers will take place every day before we commence our proceedings and that no hon. Member, whatever his grievance—I do not comment on anyone's grievance — will be allowed to disrupt that important and vital tradition?

Mr. Speaker: I confirm what the hon. Gentleman has said and draw to the attention of the House the Prayer for Parliament, which encompasses what we are about in this place.

Immigration (Members' Representations)

4.57 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a matter with you who are the guardian of the rights of Members and to ask whether you will make urgent inquiries into reports published during the recess that the Government are proposing to introduce rules that would stop hon. Members making representations to Ministers on matters about immigration and nationality. This would be a——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is this the matter about which the hon. Gentleman has written to me alleging a matter of privilege?

Mr. Madden: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but it was not in that——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have not yet had an opportunity to study the hon. Gentleman's letter in detail. He cannot raise a privilege matter in the House in this way.

Mr. Madden: I am aware of that, Mr. Speaker, and I do not wish to raise it in that context. I wish to raise it in the context that I should like you to make urgent inquiries into whether the Government are seeking to make such a proposal. It would represent the denial of the long-standing rights of Members. It would clearly create very considerable difficulties, because the representations that we make are usually against the advice and recommendations of officials. However, I understand that the Government will insist that in future we should make representations only to officials and not to Ministers. Lastly, it would create——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a matter for the Government, not a matter for me. I have listened to the hon. Gentleman, and I shall consider what he has said in his letter and reply to him.

Orders of the Day

Housing (Scotland) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

4.59 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill is presented to the House towards the end of a decade of substantial and significant achievement in Scottish housing. Over the past decade, the Government have been entitled to point to a reputation and record of solid progress in almost every important matter affecting housing in Scotland.

Ten years ago, 120,000 houses in Scotland were deemed to be below the tolerable standard — that is, without some of the basic amenities that we ought to be able to take for granted. Today that figure is down to 55,000, and in a few years, on the present course, we shall be able to eliminate such houses.

We have also been concentrating on seeking to meet those categories of housing applicants who have particular requirements and whose housing must be of a particular nature to meet their special circumstances. There, too, we can point to some remarkable progress. For example, there has been a huge explosion in the quantity of sheltered housing, which is often deemed to be the most suitable for elderly people as it enables them to preserve maximum independence with the presence of care, when that is required.

Only 10,000 sheltered houses existed in 1979. Today that figure is 33,000, and is growing rapidly. The same is true of housing for the disabled. Such housing has to be specially adapted to meet the needs of disabled people in Scotland. Ten years ago only 3,000 such houses existed in Scotland. Today the figure is over 14,000, and it is growing by leaps and bounds.

We have also been anxious to ensure the development of one of the most exciting aspects of Scottish housing — the growth of the housing association movement. That movement had its roots in the developments of the late 1960s and 1970s, but under the present Government, it has enjoyed an explosion of resources and activity that has made a substantial impact. In 1979 there were only about 9,000 housing association tenants. Today, over 40,000 housing association tenants are being administered by literally hundreds of housing associations, thereby demonstrating the health and vitality of the housing association movement throughout Scotland. I make no secret of the fact that we have deliberately increased the resources of the Housing Corporation because the voluntary housing movement is highly creditable and deserves maximum support.

When commenting on housing, Labour Members often concentrate, understandably, on local authority housing and seek to encourage the House to consider the capital needs of the local authority housing stock in Scotland, which represents such a significant proportion of the housing stock north of the border. There, too, we can point with considerable satisfaction to what has been achieved — for example, in respect of local authority resources for modernising and improving the housing stock. In 1979 it amounted to £242 million. Last year it was £570 million which, even taking inflation into account, clearly represents a substantial real increase in the resources available to Scottish local authorities for the improvement, modernisation and rehabilitation of their housing stock. Capital expenditure on housing in Scotland was cut during the latter years of the last Labour Government, but, under this Administration, there has been continuing growth in such expenditure.

We have also given considerable importance to the need for growth of home ownership in Scotland, because we are aware that Scotland had—and still has—a lower level of home ownership than the rest of the United Kingdom and of almost any other country in western Europe. That has not been because of any lack of interest in home ownership by the people of Scotland, but because of the lack of opportunity until recent years. Since the enactment of the Tenants' Rights Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980, more than 106,000 Scottish public sector tenants have exercised that right, and the number of applications to purchase throughout the Scottish public sector is running at an all-time high, for local authorities, the Scottish Special Housing Association and the new towns. Hon. Members on both sides of the House should be delighted by that.

The Tenants' Rights Etc. (Scotland) Act provided the right to buy and, for the first time, gave Scottish local authority and public sector tenants statutory rights with regard to security of tenure and other such matters. Those rights are now taken for granted and are jealously protected by local authority tenants. They were introduced by the present Government and the measure that provided those rights was opposed by every Opposition Member. We must consider the Bill against that background of solid achievement over the past decade.

Before I turn to the detailed provisions of the Bill, it might be useful to refer to the Government's overall objectives and strategy with regard to housing policy in Scotland. I do not deny that an enormous amount of work still needs to be done. I shall identify three basic objectives which sum up the Government's housing strategy.

First, there is a need for a major regeneration of the peripheral housing estates in Scotland, particularly in central Scotland. There has been much reference south of the border to the need for inner urban regeneration. As we know from the Glasgow eastern area renewal project, perhaps the largest single need in that area has to a large extent been considered and dealt with during the past 10 years.

Other problems exist in most of our urban concentrations, but if one has to point to a comparable overall requirement in Scotland, it is in the peripheral housing estates that we see the need for urban regeneration. That is of particular significance when one considers any housing Bill. I am not suggesting that the regeneration of peripheral housing estates is merely a matter of housing policy. It goes much wider than that. As we have seen in the east end of Glasgow, we can achieve an environmental improvement and a transformation of the housing stock and we can even widen the forms of tenure that exist in such areas, but we also need to consider other means to ensure the economic as well as the visual and environmental regeneration of such areas.

I am not suggesting that the Bill or any housing measures could by themselves achieve all that needs to be done in respect of peripheral housing estates, but housing is clearly an important factor. It is a fundamental factor in the eyes of those who live in such peripheral estates, but not because they are slum properties. For the most part, slum properties have almost entirely disappeared in Scotland, but there is some monotony and dull and tedious housing which has created major problems in terms of the economic and environmental regeneration of those areas. Housing can make an important contribution to resolving such difficulties. The contribution of housing to the regeneration of peripheral estates is one of the Government's fundamental objectives.

The second major objective must be the further substantial increase in the level of home ownership in Scotland. Although home ownership has increased from about 35 per cent. of total population in 1979 to about 42 per cent. at the present time, that figure is woefully below the level that is to be found elsewhere in the United Kingdom and in most of the other developed countries. We must enable those on low incomes who aspire to home ownership to achieve it.

One of the most interesting and important developments in recent months has been a substantial increase in the number of those who live in flatted accommodation who are applying for the right to purchase their homes under the current legislation. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) may not be interested in assisting those on low incomes to achieve home ownership, which he takes for granted for himself and his family. We consider that it is insufficient for one simply to pay lip service to the desirability of home ownership for those on low incomes, unless one is prepared to provide the means whereby they can exercise that right — that means substantial discounts for those who live in such property — because that is no more than a cruel charade. Therefore, the continuing improvement in home ownership is of major significance.

That is not to say that home ownership will be the desired form of housing for every person in Scotland or in any other area. Frankly, at the end of the day, I do not mind whether individuals seek to buy or to rent their homes, as long as they have a real and meaningful choice and have chosen that form of housing which is most satisfactory to their requirements. It must be a meaningful, real choice, and it must not be forced upon them by the absence of any alternative to the housing rights that they have traditionally exercised. That is a significant factor.

The third major objective of our housing policy is, in substantial way, to widen the forms of tenure that are available to people north of the border. There has been a tendency to assume that the available choice, even for those who have any choice at all, is a crude, simplistic one between becoming an owner-occupier or continuing with traditional municipal housing tenure.

Opposition Members are aware that, in recent years, there has been increasing interest in broadening the spectrum of the kinds of tenure that are available. If one wishes to remain a tenant of rented property, there are several alternatives to the simple traditional relationship with one's local authority.

Most people will acknowledge—I hope that it is not a matter of political controversy—the interest in and the growth of tenant co-operatives of management and ownership kinds, of housing association activity, and the whole spectrum of new kinds of tenure. Tenan to remain tenants can take on much greater res for the administration and improvement of t and community in which they live. Therefore, alternative landlords. Often, the alternative la housing association, a tenants co-operative, or sector landlord, which often raises the ire of Members.

Let us be quite clear. The alternative to council housing of the traditional kind is n private sector landlord. That must be part of provision, but there are also many other excitin tenure. I hope that, in giving new rights to encourage them to choose other forms of tenur not simply invite a knee-jerk reaction from assume that they must oppose the legislation a harmful to their interests.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): If landlord is such a valuable right, why can extended to private sector tenants?

Mr. Rifkind: I shall clearly answer the Gentleman's question. The public sector, Parliament, has a right to determine a diminu property rights of property owned in the pub That principle is fundamentally different from in the private property of individual citizen Members, in government if not in opposition, applied a similar distinction.

I tried to state what I believe to be the t objectives that the Government are seeking in their housing policy. What are the major proble face at present? We face one particular problem. we have a crude surplus of housing stock in S in other words, we have more houses in Scot there are households seeking accommodation conscious of the fact that in many areas there a lists and many people who are dissatisfied with t in which they are living.

That is not because it is slum property— there are few slums in Scotland at present—b the property is in a locality that has a poor repu which, for varying reasons, they are anxious to l if the house in which they live is quite adequate, the house is too large or too small for their circu Of course, there are also dampness problems. T the unprecedentedly high gross capital expen local authority housing should be welcomed. ensure that the mismatch of housing to people rectified as quickly and effectively as possible.

Secondly, we have a major problem that, parts of Scotland, there remains no meaning other than the municipal housing sector. In Mor Motherwell, virtually 80 per cent. of all h administered and run as traditional local authority stock.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): What with that?

Mr. Rifkind: Unless the people of Monkl Motherwell are quite different from the re population of Scotland and the United Kingdo a lot wrong with that. The hon. Gentlem appreciate that the vast majority of people in M and Motherwell and comparable areas would choice. However benevolent, well-meaning or well-resourced their local authorities might be, the fact is that Opposition Members would like to have some meaningful choice in respect of the kind of housing tenure that they operate.

Glasgow district council remains the largest single landlord in western Europe. It is no surprise that the committee that was appointed by Glasgow district council to reflect on such matters recommended that at least 25 per cent. of Glasgow district council's housing stock should be disposed of in alternative forms of tenure to new landlords of various kinds.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Why not?

Mr. Rifkind: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I am glad that the matter will not divide the House. Indeed, the more we see the response of Opposition Members, the more difficult it is to understand why they are likely, as I understand it, to vote against the Bill.

The Bill seeks to deal with major requirements and problems in three ways; first, by the creation of Scottish Homes; secondly, by a major attempt to attract substantial sums of private sector investment, not as an alternative but as a complement to public sector investment; and, thirdly, by providing new rights for public sector tenants with regard to the landlord of their choice.

In respect of Scottish Homes, I shall make two points as clear as I can. First, few people would question me when I say that, for the first time, the concept of a unified housing agency in Scotland has been extremely warmly welcomed. I cannot think of any significant source of comment that has done other than welcome the concept of a unified housing agency. That is indeed what Scottish Homes is and will be. Secondly, I am aware that there has been substantial controversy. Concern has been expressed by individual tenants of the SSHA who have launched a campaign and sought to suggest that the creation of Scottish Homes will somehow be a threat to them, their rights or their positions as tenants of the SSHA.

I say to Opposition Members what I have said to SSHA tenants. Any such concern is totally unjustified. There is not and never has been any proposal whatsoever to impose any degree of compulsion on any individual SSHA tenant. Indeed, I go beyond that statement. I remind Opposition Members that, as we were the Government—indeed, I was the Housing Minister at the time—who, for the first time provided these very rights for SSHA tenants, I should hardly be likely now to present a Bill to the House to remove them.

I challenge Opposition Members to state one single way in which SSHA tenants will be compelled to obtain new landlords or to lose any of the basic rights that the Government have provided for them in the tenants' rights legislation. If they are unable to provide any such evidence, I hope that they will not continue unnecessarily alarming tenants. That does no service to tenants, and, in due course, it will be shown to be unnecessary.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that many of the fears that have been stirred up, for whatever reason, could have been allayed if proper consultation had taken place with the existing tenants of the SSHA? If such consultation had taken place and SSHA tenants desired to remain with their existing landlords, would have affected his plans for the Bill?

Mr. Rifkind: Not only were major consul documents published, but I had a meeting with te claiming to represent the tenant community, alth none of us has any way of knowing how many tenant represent. The SSHA sent every tenant a letter indic that none of their rights was affected by the measu

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): Sure right hon. and learned Gentleman is not surprised fears of SSHA tenants, because they have take elementary precaution of reading "Scottish Ho which says that the Secretary of State has it in mi an interesting phrase—that on the creation of Sc Homes the entire stock of SSHA houses sha transferred as a holding operation to a new lan division. It says that arrangements for a landlord div would be essentially transitional, and it suggests th 83,000 tenants of the SSHA would be magically put some other form of tenure over a short period. Tha the clear implication of those words. The right hon learned Gentleman has had to retreat in some dis from what he had in mind when he wrote "Sc Homes", which we welcome, but he is being a little in suggesting that the SSHA was scaremongering, wh has clearly won a considerable victory, if he is right in he is now saying.

Mr. Rifkind: I know the hon. Gentleman wan believe in the sinister conspiracy theory of politics, b he has read the document he will be aware that document makes it abundantly clear that while Government continue to hope that tenants will exe their rights to opt for new forms of tenure, there i question, nor has there ever been a question, of any te being obliged against his will to form a hou association, to acquire a new landlord or to be part tenants' co-operative. If the hon. Gentleman would li read from the document a single sentence or phrase says that those objectives will come about by b imposed on tenants against their will, or irrespecti their will, he will have a point to make. He cannot say nor has he said it.

The hon. Gentleman has referred to the Governm continuing policy: that we hope that SSHA ten eventually will become either owner-occupiers or ten of a private sector body. As a long-term objective, Government have no desire or policy to be a landlo Scotland or any part of the United Kingdom. I have m it clear on numerous occasions that the pace at which will happen will depend on individual tenants exerci their rights.

Mr. Dewar rose——

Mr. Rifkind: If the hon. Gentleman has some extract to read out, I will give way, but not if he is sin going to read out what he has already read out. The no suggestion of any compulsion on any individual ten and the hon. Gentleman knows that—[Interruption. is a matter of constant pleasure that Opposition Memb knowing that there is nothing in the Bill to which they legitimately object, are desperately anxious to find a ca to unify them in their pathetic attempt to suggest cau for concern.

Mr. Dewar: I go back to the question. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman were a tenant enjoying security of tenure and his landlord announced that he was going to be shunted into a transit camp—a landlord division of a new organisation — and that would essentially be a transitional arrangement, would it not be reasonable for that tenant to think that he was under some form of threat, and that persuasion might turn into duress? Would that feeling not still be in his mind if he had listened to the right hon. and learned Gentleman in the past few minutes, because only 30 seconds ago he said that it was the long-term intention of the Government that they should not be landlords in the public sector on a permanent basis. The right hon. and learned Gentleman seems to be saying that at some time he hopes to be able to get rid of SSHA tenants. Where is the choice for those who wish to remain in the SSHA under public sector tenure if the right hon. and learned Gentleman is still proclaiming his intention as a landlord of getting rid of them at the first opportunity?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman finds himself incapable of pointing to compulsion. That is the crunch. The Government have made it no secret that they are anxious to try to persuade tenants to opt for new forms of tenure. There has never been any proposal of compulsion. The hon. Gentleman would agree that we can hardly compel tenants to form a housing association against their will; it is physically impossible. If that were one of the major areas of growth that the Government were seeking to encourage, it goes without saying that that could be achieved only voluntarily.

The position is that Scottish Homes, far from posing any threat to tenants, is an unprecedented opportunity for them, if they so wish, to exercise as wide a choice as they believe appropriate. Secondly, Scottish Homes will be a means of attracting the major private sector investment that is crucial to the contribution required for the regeneration of housing in Scotland. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Where is the evidence?"] I will refer to the evidence later in my speech. Thirdly, Scottish Homes will provide the means of advising not only its own tenants but tenants throughout Scotland of the opportunities available to them and the means by which they can be exercised.

Before turning to the detailed provisions of the Bill, I offer my recognition of the remarkable achievements of the Housing Corporation in Scotland and the SSHA over their years of operation. Their activities will live on and will continue to make a necessary contribution under the umbrella of Scottish Homes.

Part I of the Bill provides for the establishment of Scottish Homes. It will have wide powers, many of which are held today by the Housing Corporation or the SSHA. It will operate under my direction and will be funded by grant from the Scottish block. The Bill provides for the dissolution of the SSHA and the transfer of its assets and liabilities to Scottish Homes. The Housing Corporation's responsibilities to housing associations in Scotland will also transfer to the new body. It is clear that the provisions bear a distinct resemblance to those which established the Scottish Development Agency in 1975. I have already emphasised my desire to see the same dynamic approach brought to housing as the SDA has brought to the Scottish economy.

Mr. Dewar: The right hon. and learned Gentleman voted against it.

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, and the hon. Gentleman be ready to vote against Scottish Homes. He bear that in mind, and draw the necessary co

Part II of the Bill will mean that in Scot England and Wales, there will be two new types —assured tenancies and short assured tenan for both types of tenancies will be freely between landlord and tenant, although either p able to ask the rent assessment committee to rent in certain situations. The provisions are detailed, and I mention only the main ones.

The Bill does not seek to introduce the ne one fell swoop; it applies only to new lettings c the legislation comes into force. It will not appl tenants, who will remain within the current sys regulation. There will be an amendment to the rules and an end to the phasing of registered ren as I will explain later. Part II of the Bill does the decontrolling measures of 1957. The Bill the Rent Act 1957 in several important respec

First, that Act removed rent control from so lettings, whereas the decontrol now proposed only to new lettings. Secondly, the Act gave th statutory security of tenure or protection fro whereas the present Bill confirms security of strengthens the law against harassment by Thirdly, the Act operated at a time when provided no support for tenants in need of whereas we now have a system of housing ben those tenants who find that they cannot afford rents.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central) right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that, are to be fixed by a bargain struck between landlord, in situations where there is an acute accommodation, such as in Edinburgh and rents will rise and this will, in turn, increase the public expenditure through increased housing

Mr. Rifkind: One of the reasons why, in there is an acute shortage of accommodation h virtual disappearance of the private rented se this sort of area. The hon. Member for Edinbur (Mr. Darling) will know that one of the p finding rented accommodation in Edinburgh a the absence of a private rented sector. There people who, for various reasons, find loca housing either unattractive or unobtainable cannot contemplate owner-occupation. I sh thought that the hon. Gentleman would be acknowledge that, unless we can revive the pri sector, unless that form of housing is availab who want it, some of his constituents will not f to meet their requirements. So we have to find doing that.

The only sensible, civilised way of doing tha proper rents to be charged, but where tenan income—[HON. MEMBERS: "They will be hi may, in some cases, be high, but if they are it s proper market rents are not being charged at t If hon. Gentlemen want to revive alternative their constituents who experience difficulty a is surely more sensible to subsidise the tenant w help through housing benefit than to maintain level of rents and thereby destroy that whol housing.

Very few who are involved in housing and who are not simply approaching these matters from a polemical point of view would do other than acknowledge that the disappearance of a private rented sector has created major problems in meeting the needs, particularly in urban areas, of many young married couples and others in Scotland. Hon. Gentlemen know that, although they may be unable, for political reasons, to admit it. A serious attempt must be made to revive this sector, and as long as the housing benefit scheme can ensure help for those on lower incomes it is well worth pursuing.

Mr. Darling: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman seriously suggesting that in central Edinburgh there is a large number of empty flats waiting to come on the market if the rent is right? Is not the problem an acute shortage of space to let rather than of rents being unattractive to landlords?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is incorrect. There are two problems. There are those who have accommodation but who, for various reasons and because of the present system, find it unattractive to rent; and there is the almost total absence of new buildings for private renting over the years, for similar reasons. The hon. Gentleman knows that there have been many gap sites in Edinburgh which in the end have been used for owner-occupier purposes but which, under a different system, might have been used for the development of private rented houses, thereby meeting the housing requirements of some of his constituents. So his own policy has been against the interests of the very people that he claims to represent.

Clauses 12 to 32 define the scope of the new rent regime and deal with security of tenure and the question of any rent increases. Most important, they provide that a landlord may recover possession of property only on certain specified grounds listed in schedule 5, and that he must follow a set procedure in seeking possession. The grounds for possession are fewer and slightly simpler than those currently available to landlords.

Clauses 33 to 37 concern harassment of tenants. Under the present law, it is an offence for any person to harass a tenant with the inention of causing him to leave his home. Providing proof of such an intention in the courts has, in practice, been difficult, so the Bill proposes an additional offence of harassing a tenant if the landlord knows or ought to know that his actions are likely to cause the tenant to leave. There is also a new civil right to improved compensation for tenants evicted illegally. Thus the Bill strengthens the tenant's position against a landlord who is tempted to act unscrupulously.

Clause 38 provides for the abolition of phasing of rent increases. Phasing prevents a landlord from obtaining the proper rent for his premises, so we are convinced that it should go, but on a timetable which is fair to both landlord and tenant.

Clauses 39 to 42 cover the transitional arrangements required as the Rents (Scotland) Act 1984 is phased out for new lettings and as the new regime comes into effect.

Clause 43 and schedule 6 change the circumstances in which someone can succeed to a regulated tenancy. Succession as a statutory tenant will be limited to the deceased tenant's spouse. Another member of the tenant's family will be able to succeed to the tenancy but will be subject to the assured tenancy regime and must have been living with the tenant for five years before the tenant's death.

Clause 64 relates to the new function of rent

[Mr. Rifkind]

There is no reason why the community should be expected to pay housing benefit for a house which is grossly in excess of what a particular tenant requires. We are talking not about existing tenants, but about a new tenancy. If the tenant or the landlord knows that, whatever rent is charged, it will be paid by the public through housing benefit, I should have thought that Opposition Members would be the first to appreciate the potential for abuse. They have been the first to emphasise their anxiety about the possibility of excessive rents being charged. They do not want landlords to be able to abuse the system. Therefore, some check must be made to ensure that a landlord and a tenant are not acting in collusion. It will not happen in many cases, but it has happened in the past and could happen in the future. It is in the public interest to ensure that there has been no such collusion.

Mr. Wilson: The Secretary of State says that a tenant "wishes" to live in a larger property or one that is "more luxurious" than some anonymous person will deem appropriate for his or her circumstances. Will he acknowledge that some people who live in houses larger than mystical rules might determine to be appropriate are there not because they wish it but because of force of circumstance — sometimes specifically against their wishes? How will they be protected from the person who will go round with the measuring tape saying whether they are living in too big or too luxurious a house? Will he measure the pile of the carpets to define the luxury which is appropriate to someone in those circumstances? Will it mean the persecution of people living alone, sometimes in difficult circumstances? As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said, they are precisely the people about whom bogus crocodile tears have been shed in the context of the poll tax.

Mr. Rifkind: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's desire to create a bogy which he can then try to knock down, but there is no intention on anyone's part to deal with the matter other than sensitively and flexibly.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that every time an individual or family applies for a council property, the measurements tht he has mentioned should be used to determine the type of property that should be allocated?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend makes a perfectly valid point. He should not be too worried about this. The Opposition cannot find anything of substance in the Bill which they can legitimately oppose, so they must find a reason to justify their vote tonight. No doubt this is part of that exercise.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): The right hon. and learned Gentleman should not be allowed to skate over the point. This could be a form of compulsory decanting. For example, as a consequence of losing her husband, a lady could be deemed to be living in property that is too luxurious—that is the Secretary of State's definition—for her. He said that the Government would approach the matter with sensitivity and understanding. The loss of a husband can be a traumatic experience. Where in the Bill do we find the sensitivity and understanding about which he is talking?

Mr. Rifkind: I have clearly said th about gross over-accommodation. It g that the housing needs of a widow are n than those of a pensioner couple. It is except in the minds of Opposition Me

The Bill sets out the detailed will apply where the right to acquire pr Tenants' choice will be exactly that. N possible without the consent of the tena contemplate transfer under the provi unless he wishes to do so.

Part III provides for limited exceptions to the right for a public sector landlord to refuse an application in certain circumstances and for references to the land tribunal where disputes arise or delays occur. Provision is also made for Scottish Homes' agreement to be required for the first subsequent disposal of any property transferred under the tenants' choice provisions.

I should mention three matters that are not in the Bill. The White Paper proposed the abolition of the outstanding debt test which limits the discount that can be given under the right to buy on houses provided or improved since 1978. Although its abolition would benefit many tenants and encourage them to change to owner-occupation, I have noted the arguments made by local authorities and housing associations against wholesale abolition. I am reviewing what should be done, with a view, if possible, to introducing an amendment later.

The White Paper also promised a simplification——

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): The Secretary of State is outlining many proposals on Second Reading. What advice would he give local authorities which are about to allocate properties on estates, as Hamilton district council is at Barncluith? The council is in no position to know whether, at the end of the period specified in the Bill, it can recover outstanding debt or whether, due to a subsequent amendment, future rent payers will have to bear the burden of the benefits that the Government are giving sitting tenants.

Mr. Rifkind: That is a perfectly fair question. I appreciate the need to clear this matter up as soon as possible and I hope to be able to reach a conclusion at a fairly early date. I am not in a position to announce a decision today, but I accept the thrust of the hon. Gentleman's argument that local authorities are entitled to know fairly soon what is likely to be in the Bill when its progress through Parliament is complete. I hope to be able to communicate that in the reasonably near future to the district councils and to others interested.

The White Paper also promised a simplification of the arrangements for providing Government support for expenditure by local authorities on improvement and repair and other grants. An amendment to give effect to that will be introduced soon.

The White Paper made it clear that, consistent with the general intention to give people a wider choice of housing, we would seek powers to enable new town development corporations to dispose of their housing assets to a wide range of alternative landlords. We believe that it is important that the new towns should be able to offer a greater choice of house type, tenure and ownership to meet the needs and aspirations of their residents, and an amendment to enable that to happen will be introduced if it is thought to be necessary.

Mr. Lambie: Will the right of new town tenants to choose their landlords include the right to choose the local district council?

Mr. Rifkind: Scotland already has a higher proportion of local authority housing than almost any other country, and we believe that the one thing that it does not require is an increase in local authority housing—[Interruption.] There is a multiplicity of forms of tenure and, as I said, the one form of tenure that I do not consider appropriate is that which already dominates the Scottish housing scene. 5.55 pm

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof,

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill which fails to tackle the crisis of homelessness in Scotland or to provide for resources to improve Scotland's housing stock, threatens to increase rents and reduce the security of tenants, further undermines the ability of elected local councils to provide for the housing needs of their people, and proposes to extend the power of central Government through an unaccountable quango."

For the past hour, the Secretary of State has looked distinctly uncomfortable. He started predictably with a flourish of triumph and a mass of rather misleading statistics. However, when he finished declaiming and started to deal with the argument and tried to explain the contents of the Bill, the triumphant flourish fell away, leaving a discordant and defensive collection of false notes. I do not think that he carried the House; even his hon. Friends looked distinctly uncomfortable.

This is a complex, lengthy and, I concede, important Bill. I agree with the Secretary of State that it has considerable potential. The House must weigh up that potential and decide whether it is potential for good or for bad. Having read the Bill and spent time examining the detailed results that would flow from it, I am convinced that it is confused in thought and that it will damage the interests of many groups of tenants in both the private and the public sectors. Much of it is irrevelant and the principle is badly flawed.

Directly or indirectly, the Bill will affect about half the households of Scotland — the households that rent in one way or another. Therefore, it deserves special attention. Consideration and consultation are important not just to the Bill but to the parliamentary process. We are entitled to protest about the way in which the Government have handled this matter. The "Scottish Homes" document was hurried from the press to give some sort of substance to a threadbare and flagging electoral campaign. It was followed by a White Paper last November and a plethora of consultative documents which were needed because "Scottish Homes" was no more than a political broadside and because the White Paper posed more questions than it answered. Indeed, the fact that it had given rise to much dismay and anxiety was reflected clearly in the Scottish Special Housing Association tenants' campaign, which many of my hon. Friends supported.

Against that background, the timetable should be the subject of severe criticism. We have fundamental discussion documents, raising questions that strike at the very heart of the Bill. The Government asked for comments on those documents by 31 December—in one case by 14 January — yet the Bill on which the consultation is centred was only published on 3 December and this debate is taking place before the end of the consultation period on some of the documents. That is not a proper way to proceed. It is insulting to public opinion, which should be heard and which should be effective; indeed, it was effective to some extent during the SSHA and wider public sector tenants' campaigns.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) rightly drew attention to just one of the many important and completely unfinished matters on the Government's agenda when he referred to the possible abolition of the cost floor in the sale of council houses. We do not know what is happening, altho State said that we would know soon stand, in some areas of Scotland, th renting is being placed in limbo. I am sure that the Secretary of State gets my message.

Hon. Members: Michael Hirst?

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Michael Ancram?

Mr. Dewar: My hon. Friends remind me that there could be more than one unfortunate way of solving the problem of that appointment.

Mr. Harry Ewing: Only a couple of weeks ago, there was the disgraceful appointment to the SDA board of Sir Alex Fletcher, who voted against the establishment of the agency in the first place. That appointment was an insult and shows that my hon. Friend's fears are well founded.

Mr. Dewar: I shall leave that matter there.

Mr. Bill Walker rose——

Hon. Members: There is your man!

Mr. Dewar: Jobs have passed the hon. Gentleman by in this place and the same may well apply when he leaves the House. He should not be so eager.

Mr. Walker: That was a nasty jibe. In all seriousness, despite the flippancy on the Opposition Back Benches, I hope that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) does not take the view that anyone who has been a Member of the House should automatically be debarred from any other activity associated with Government policy.

Mr. Dewar: I did not suggest that as a general rule. I merely made a reference, the point of which I believe was appreciated by the House.

I hope that the Under-Secretary will be able to give some reassurance about the composition of the board of Scottish Homes. The White Paper specifically states:

> "The position of tenants is somewhat different and particular attention will be paid to the desirability of appointing someone able to contribute experience of the interests of tenants."

Schedule 1, which governs these matters, contains no reference whatever to that pledge. I hope that it has not been dropped and that it will be reinstated in Committee or that a cast-iron assurance will be given by the Government. Otherwise, the silence of the Bill on this point could be interpreted as sinister.

My objection is fundamental. As I have already outlined, I believe that the Bill is an attempt to undermine and encroach on the proper responsibilities of local government. Ministers may protest their innocence, but the education discussion document, which will doubtless lead to legislation, the local government legislation and the Bill, with all its explanatory documents, constitute a trilogy which local government rightly regards as threatening. If some of the more extreme proposals are implemented, councillors will be reduced to middlemen negotiating contracts with the private sector for a greatly diminished level of service.

It will be a long time before I forget the reaction of the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Lang) when it was brought to his attention that the freeze on industrial a levels meant that an enormous escala into the poll tax and that there wo increases in the poll tax if present bud He replied, "They wouldn't dare," an it clear that the whole point of the pol the level of service and the ability of l meet the demands of the people of Homes is an invitation to go down the are plenty of quotations suggesting th no longer regard local authorities as housing services but as being elbowed stage by the new quango that we a endorse.

It is interesting that the Secretary of deal of time talking about public secto a little time analysing the impact of private sector tenants. However, I surprised by that. has been done and to some of the powers that are implied and the script that has been written for Scottish Homes. The form itself is comparatively neutral. There is, indeed, a case for some reform, especially of the Housing Corporation, but the Secretary of State must not take from that any endorsement of the broad aims that he described or of the likely practical result of the policy set out in the Bill.

The idea that we should try to revive the private rented sector is no doubt laudable in itself. Of course,44es as the Secretary of State implied, the trouble is that the only way in which he can do so is by making letting more and more attractive to the landlord. In effect, the landlord must have a higher return out of higher rents. That will be at the expense of many tenants and that is the rub for Conservative Members and, indeed, for anyone who is interested in this question.

However, it is not just a matter of that philosophical point. If one considers some of the practical results of private sector tenancies, one sees that the balance of advantage is swinging heavily against private sector tenants. If they enter the private sector after the passing of the Bill, they will have to become assured tenants with assured tenancies, and several consequences will flow from that. Alternatively, they could obtain a short assured tenancy which, ironically, may well be longer than an assured tenancy. However, I shall pass by that little idiosyncrasy. Those hon. Members who serve in Committee will no doubt look forward to debating the "ish" of a short assured tenancy which may cause some problems if dealt with in an afternoon sitting. However, I leave that issue for the future.

The point is that with an assured tenancy there will be a weakening of the tenant's position. There is the issue of security for the tenant himself. The Secretary of State fairly referred to the fact that if someone were to be evicted, the landlord must go to court. However, the grounds for eviction have changed and are now much more in favour of the landlord. I shall give one example.

If the Secretary of State considers ground 10—I am sure that he does not need to look at it — he will discover that if it is proved that someone is behind with the rent and has been so for three months—the tenant need not be behind with three months' rent, it may be a sum of rent that has been unpaid for three months—he can be evicted and the court has no discretion in the matter, however deserving, difficult or human the circumstances may be.

That was not the situation before. The landlord could, of course, go to court, but the court had the discretion to look at the circumstances and to do what was just. There is now no discretion, which is symptomatic of the fundamental weakening of the tenant's position, which could be instanced in other ways.

The Secretary of State made a passing reference to succession to a tenancy. He mentioned the rule that if a relative, living in the family, wishes to succeed to the tenancy, that person must have been in the family, in the house, for five years. Under the present law, that period is six months for a protected tenant. It is arguable that six months is too short, but I am sure that five years is far too long.

All of us know of cases, perhaps from personal friends, but certainly from constituents, in which someone has moved legitimately and genuinely into the home to nurse an aged parent and, three or four years after that burden was willingly shouldered, the parent dies. Is the carer now to be unsure whether he or she can rely on the private sector landlord for the right to remain in that house? That cannot be progress or justice.

In fairness to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) I should say that he wrote to me on 11 January. I received his letter today. In it he was extremely defensive and wrote:

"Although the Bill provides that the landlord will be able to seek repossession within 12 months of learning of the tenant's death, it is important to note that, as with all assured tenancies, he will be obliged to go through a proper process of applying to the sheriff before the tenant can be obliged to give up the lease."

However, if the sheriff has no discretion, that seems a poor defence.

"Furthermore, since the landlord will be receiving a market rent and will get the same rent whoever the tenant is, he will in fact have no incentive to terminate the lease."

I am sorry, but that is just naive. I hope that the Under-Secretary does not mind my suggesting that he is being naive. That accusation may have been made before—I do not know.

However, I advise the hon. Member that there is another reason why a landlord may want to terminate a lease. He may want to get the tenant out so that he can sell the property to realise the capital sum. That will happen frequently. Therefore, it is wrong merely to say that it is sufficient to rely on the fact that it is always "open to a tenant who transfers to negotiate a right of succession in the terms of the lease itself. Indeed, if both parties agree, it would be possible to write the present statutory rights into the new lease."

I have no doubt that it would be possible, but I know of many private sector landlords who would be anxious to avoid that agreement and who will avoid it. I repeat that the position of private sector tenants will be significantly weakened.

I give two other examples. First, the Bill contains the power to end the phasing of rent increases in the private sector. All Opposition Members know that that system has been in operation for some time on the basis of £104 per annum or a quarter of the existing rent, whichever is the greater. That was a real and substantial protection of which most of us have had experience, perhaps not as tenants but by being in contact with tenants. That protection will go. Second, key money will be legitimised by the Bill. That was banished by a Tory Government after the bitter experience of the 1950s, 1960s and the early 1970s. I cannot see that provision as being in any way a return to better days.

Finally, the point of the whole manoeuvre is unashamedly that the private sector tenants of the future will have not a fair rent system, but a market rent system, which means that they will have to pay considerably more. I could go on to mention other points, but time does not allow that now, although I hope that in Committee it will. My point is that private sector tenants, in whose aid this whole scheme has been brought forward, will be considerably damaged in the process.

Mr. Rifkind: At some stage, will the hon. Gentleman inform the House whether he and his colleagues wish to see some growth in the private rented sector and if they do, how they would wish that to be brought about?

Mr. Dewar: I should certainly be interested in seeing that. However, I do not believe that it should be bought at the kind of price that is implied in the Bill. I am honest in saying that that would be extremely difficult to bring about and no doubt we shall deal with that in greater detail later. I hope that, without overstating my case, I am suggesting that, however desirable the Government's objective, broadly stated, may be, it will be purchased at a considerable price.

Not only private sector tenants will be affected; let us consider housing association tenants. What solid comfort can they take from the Bill? They will face a great deal of uncertainty and confusion. After all, at present, sitting tenants in housing association property have the right to buy, but those who move within the housing stock after the Bill is implemented will lose that right and any new housing association tenant will not have it. It seems odd to have two households side by side, one with and one without the right.

Any new housing association tenant will have an assured tenancy, and my earlier points about security and succession apply. Rents are a mystery. The Government say that there will not be the old fair rent system. There was talk in some consultative documents about reasonable rents. Then there was talk about market rents and rather less than market rents, but how much less no one knows. We are facing substantial changes in the housing association grant system. I assume—perhaps the Under-Secretary will confirm this when he replies—that that will require legislation. I hope that he can also assure us that those changes will not be lost in some overall United Kingdom legislation. That would be particularly ironic at the time when the Housing Corporation in Scotland was being disentangled from the rest of the country and was being put on a separate basis.

Many hon. Members will know that it has been calculated—this has not been challenged by the Scottish Office—that on a housing association grant of 50 per cent., a unit cost of £33,000, which is about the average for inner-city rehabilitation of old tenement properties, an index-linked loan of 6 per cent. to make up the balance, and the usual management and maintenance costs, a three-apartment tenement flat, with a rent of about £800 under the fair rent system, will almost certainly end up with a rent of £2,500 plus per year.

The Government may not allow that to happen, because they recognise that the system has got them into such trouble, but that is the logic of the Bill and the consultation documents associated with it. That gives real credence to the genuine fears which I come across as a constituency Member and someone who perhaps moves more than others around the country that those who have given their lives to the housing association's community base will no longer be providing houses for the whole range of the community, but only for those on substantial housing benefit or those with substantial means.

The picture for the public sector is much the same. We know that massive rent increases—two or three times the rate of inflation—will come because of the further cut in the rate fund contribution this year. The Secretary of State came forward with all the exciting pros of the great job that he has done, but I looked at the last commentary available—admittedly it is about 10 months out of date — on the public sector in Scotland. Government contribution per public sector house in 1979-80 was £238, whereas in 1986-87 it was £52. That is why rents have risen, why the delivery of service is not what we should all like it to be and why the fabric of our housing stock is crumbling.

The past two years have been a bad time for those in the public sector and there is little comfort in the figures that are emerging. Naturally, the Secretary of State will say, "But we have provided a great new power with the great landlord lottery. Select-a-landlord is a great leap forward." It is to be found in clauses 51 to 60, but I do not believe that it will do a great deal for tenants in Scotland.

The other day there were pictures in every Scottish newspaper of the Minister of State riding on an elephant. It was an odd happening by any standard. If you ever visit Glasgow, Mr. Speaker, I cannot promise that you will chance upon an elephant wandering in the streets.

Mr. John Home Robertson: You will not find a Tory either, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dewar: It occurred to me that, being in Glasgow, the Minister may have felt that he was in tiger country and would be somewhat safer on the back of an elephant. Whether or not it was a matter of being safer in a howdah, it was taking the governor-general motif a little far. In any event, I suspect that it was not a spontaneous happening, but a bright idea. Perhaps the man with that bright idea also invented the pick-a-landlord scheme.

The scheme is a lottery which has been rigged. It involved one-way traffic: the public sector can leave for the private sector, but no one can go the other way. The only organisation exempted is Scottish Homes. If people opt for the scheme, they will immediately run into considerable difficulties. Surely the Secretary of State must accept that. They will lose the right to buy. The Secretary of State has made great play of its importance, but as soon as people move into the private sector, so long as it is not into Scottish Homes, they will lose the right to buy.

The Minister will know that his junior colleague has also written to me about that. The hon. Gentleman stated:

"it will be open to tenants contemplating exercising Tenants' Choice to negotiate terms under which, at some point and after the transfer, they might purchase their homes, with or without discount."

It would be open to tenants, but if a tenant said to the average private landlord, "I have a great wheeze. Let us write into the contract at some point that I can purchase the property at a 60 per cent. discount as that is what I would have received if I had stayed in the public sector," not even the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West would believe a word of it.

"the willingness of a new landlord to enter into such an agreement might well influence a tenant's decision on whether or not to proceed with a possible transfer."

I agree with that, which is why few people will bother to enter into these agreements. The Minister continued—this is even more unlikely—that perhaps it could all be agreed and the rent could be adjusted to take account of that right. Is he suggesting that a tenant would have a lower than market rent if he gave up his right to buy, and that a tenant could say to his landlord, "I'll give up my right to buy, if you'll halve the rent"?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes.

Mr. Dewar: The Secretary of State says, "Yes." I hope that he will produce the private sector landlords.

Mr. Rifkind: I find it impossible to understand why the hon. Gentleman is finding this so confusing. When a landlord is contemplating what rent to charge, the rent for a house which is subject to the right to buy will naturally be more—to make it worth his while—than the rent for a property where the tenant does not have the right to buy. If the hon. Gentleman does not understand that, he understands little.

Mr. Dewar: The Secretary of State is misleading the House. A landlord faced with the prospect of a tenant retaining the right to buy may decide that in order to buy in that right he will make a substantial concession on the other terms, including the rent, but why should a landlord make that concession if there is no right to buy? Where is the leverage or the bargaining power for a tenant in such a position? This is nonsense.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman does not appreciate that the landlord comes into the picture only if he is interested in acquiring the tenancy, and the tenant is interested in transferring it. If they are both interested in a transfer of the tenancy, these are exactly the sort of matters that they would wish to discuss. The real question involved would be whether the landlord and the tenant wished to agree a lower rent without the right to buy or a higher rent with it.

Mr. Dewar: That is in the land of make-believe. Perhaps we can have a private debate on another occasion and in another place.

Considering the factors to which I have referred, the succession and security points that I made in connection with other assured tenancies, and the fact that a market rent would be involved, all I can say to the Secretary of State is that clauses 51 to 60 will be a curiosity for housing academics in a few years' time because they will have made little impact on housing. I will not say that a tenant who has availed himself of it will be as uncommon as an elephant in Glasgow, but that may well be a fair comparison.

The common factor in all the groupings to which I have referred is the fact that rents will rise for all these tenants. There is no doubt about that. I have discussed with those connected with Quality Street some of their plans and aspirations. I very much doubt whether they will welcome the Secretary of State's remarks that they are doing better than the public sector. They regard it as something different, as a change of direction for their individual careers. They are entitled to those feelings. They do not consider it to be a pejorative reflection on the work that the public sector is carrying out, and it is unfair for the Secretary of State to make that point.

Certainly such organisations may have a slot in the market. For example, there are those who leave their homes because of divorce or matrimonial breakdown and it would be useful for them to have private sector accommodation for six or 12 months while they sort things out and make proper dispositions. Retired people may sell their homes to realise capital and may be interested in spending their last years in rented accommodation. Mobile executives also might be interested in rented accommodation.

However, I genuinely do not believe that the scheme can be run on a financial level to be attractive to the pocket and the needs of ordinary families in Scotland. That will happen only if the Government meddle with the odds by squeezing the resources of local authorities and forcing rents up again, as they have done in recent years. If they do that, they will confirm our fears about what is happening.

As we have had a debate about this, I realise that the Minister will say, "Of course we are worried about higher rents, but it will all be taken care of by the housing benefit system." That is far too confident an assumption, because section 64 coyly shelters at the back of the Bill. I was unconvinced by the Minister's explanation and defences.

Perhaps this is rather a mechanical point, but it is worth making. I understand that there are only 32 rent officers in Scotland, with about 16 in Glasgow. About 20,000 people in the private sector receive rent allowances. If every application from now on has to be taken by a rent officer and assessed according to the complicated test hinted at in section 64, the whole system will collapse. There is a reference in the explanatory memorandum to the need for more staff, but we are building an unnecessary bureaucracy, based on some peculiar social philosophy of humanitarian understanding.

I understand the point. I would not say that there is no danger of an unscrupulous landlord saying to a tenant, "We can put the rent up very high here. Do not bother going to the rent assessment committee under the Act because you will get it all back from housing benefit, and I will get a high rent." The tenant will be no worse off, but the public purse will suffer. I understand that argument, but I am unhappy that the Government can say to someone, "You are in a house for which, according to our judgment, we have decided you are paying too high a rent. You have to join the queue of the homeless or you will have to meet a substantial proportion of the rent without the benefit of any support which you could normally expect on the basis of income and needs from the housing benefit system. The only way you can avoid paying that extra money is by leaving home or asking the local authorities to bear the cost." That is asking the ratepayer ultimately to foot the bill. That is too a high a price to pay. I have reservations, but I understand the situation.

I have no sympathy with the second test, which deals with unnecessarily large accommodation. It seems extraordinary that when rent officers consider a claim for subsidy, they should also consider whether the claimant is over-accommodated. If he concludes the accommodation to be unnecessarily large, he will assess an equivalent market rent for a hypothetical dwelling of the same type in the same location which is not unnecessarily large.

A woman with a husband and a couple of kids could find that five or six years later the children have left home and the husband has died. Will that woman be told, "We have decided that your house is now unnecessarily large for you, and you can either find the additional money out of your own meagre purse, even though by every other criterion you should have help, or else you can go out on the street and find other accommodation"? That seems to be a hypocrisy, and a dangerous introduction into the law of Scotland.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): Does my hon. Friend agree that that is a Hobson's choice for individuals in this situation? The Secretary of State says that elderly citizens in houses considered to be too large for their needs will have the choice of moving into smaller property. But such a property will be governed by a secure tenancy, and if they move into a house with a secure tenancy, the market val will have to be charged. They will have to find the money from their own pockets if they move to another house or they will have to pay increased rent in their original house as a result of the withdrawal of housing benefit by the Government.

Mr. Dewar: We shall have to examine carefully in Committee whether that is the case. It might be possible to build in safeguards in such cases. The Bill is riddled with inconsistency and injustice.

Mr. Eadie: I shall be brief, as we have already had exchanges on this point. We have local authorities in the hypothetical circumstances that my hon. Friend has outlined to the House. Local authorities in difficult situations generally give lifetime undertakings to elderly people. They know that if they did not do that, they would be passing the equivalent of a death sentence in removing an elderly person to another house. If the legislation is enacted, that death sentence will be imposed upon elderly people.

Mr. Dewar: Let us hope not. It has been an unpleasant episode. The phrase "over-luxurious" is one to savour, but not one to be proud of using.

I remember the Minister's concern about the widow struggling with the rates and the unfairness of forcing her to meet a larger bill because she was living alone in the matrimonial home. I did not think that the Minister's compassion would extend only to the owner-occupier and not to the tenant.

The new housing benefit system imposes a heavy burden on those with modest incomes, as my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) well knows. For every pound over the income support level, those in receipt of rent allowance will lose 65p. Taking into account rent rebate, it goes up to 85p. That marginal rate of 85p in the pound is 25p in the pound higher than the highest marginal rate for the richest taxpayer in the land. That reinforces the poverty trap with a vengeance.

When we consider the 20 per cent. rule for local taxation which will fall on those receiving benefit, and when we look at what will happen to rent levels for every class of tenant, we see that it puts them in a cruel squeeze. It makes all the fine pleading about reviving this or that worth very little when we are squeezing the financial life out of people who deserve better and who have very little to give.

Of course, there is a lot that can be done, and a lot that ought to be done. I cannot endorse the Government's record in any way or even any approach that has been tried by the Secretary of State. I object to the hypocrisy of Ministers who praise my local authority, the city of Glasgow, yet constantly bring out new provisions, legal and otherwise, administrative and legislative, which make its life more difficult.

I understand that the Minister for Housing and Planning was in Glasgow. The hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe), another Minister in the Department of the Environment, is coming next week, I gather. I almost stubbed my toe in Barrowfield on representatives from the Prime Minister's think tank, who were all coming to look at how Glasgow was changing, to learn and to take ideas to other parts of the country. I welcome the fact that people come and look at what is happening in Glasgow, but it is happening without the so-called benefit of this legislation.

Mr. Rifkind: Absolute rubbish.

Mr. Dewar: The Minister says it is rubbish, but it is self-evidently true. It is happening because we believe in variety and in mixing tenants. The trouble is that local authorities are often restricted by the Government's penny-pinching.

Let us consider how the new par-value co-operatives —[Interruption.] The Secretary of State may laugh, but I have had experience of them in my constituency. The Southdeen par-value co-operative has got off the ground with no thanks to the Secretary of State who refused to give his permission and refused to give any help. He blocked the development at every turn, but the Glasgow district council found ways to get it off the ground because it believed in it and wanted it. The Secretary of State's remarks show a certain tendency towards double standards and are touched with hypocrisy.

Let us consider the financial situation judged by the Government's figures. In 1981-82 the Government spent £889 million on housing in Scotland. In 1988-89 it has dropped to £630 million. The housing revenue account for local authorities in Scotland has been considerably reduced from £333 million to £284 million. Such reductions have happened in almost every other sector.

The other day I received a letter from the director of the Bield housing association, saying:

"the level of finance made available for specialist housing for the elderly in Scotland has been reduced very significantly during recent years — from 29 per cent. of housing association funding in 1983-84, to only 19 per cent. in the current financial year. Meanwhile,"——

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): Tell us the total figures.

Mr. Dewar: I will come to that in a moment. The letter continues:

"the numbers of very elderly people, likely to be most at risk from the consequences of ill-health, isolation and unsatisfactory housing, continue to grow substantially. We hope you share our concern at this neglect of some of the most vulnerable in society."

The question is not whether I share its concern, but whether the Secretary of State shares that concern.

In reply to the sotto voce comment from the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) the reply given to me by the Scottish Office on 3 December makes it clear that, in real terms, in 1984-85 the budget for housing associations was £139·4 million, but in 1986-87 it was £106·5 million. The Secretary of State made the asinine point about what the budget was back in the 1970s, but the housing association movement was not off the ground then and no association had reached the point when it was making demands for finance.

Mr. Allan Stewart rose——

Mr. Dewar: No, I will not give way. I have already outstayed my welcome.

The Labour party is not alone in having doubts. The housing association movement and tenants' organisations also have doubts. The Secretary of State will be aware that the Scottish Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux has issued some guidance notes on the Bill, which state:

"The reduction in security of tenure, removal of restriction on rent levels and the proposed changes to Housing Benefits provisions will, we believe, lead to hardship for tenants and an opportunity for landlords to exploit their tenants."

I believe that that is correct and it is a fair and measured way of making the point.

If we have a housing policy the aim of which is "A more pluralist and more market-orientated system", inevitably tenants will be hurt. The Bill does nothing for housing in Scotland. It is complicated, and confuses and essentially weakens the rights of individuals. It may be summed up by the quote in the White Paper on the homeless that rejected any "stopgap" measures. That meant no help for a particularly vulnerable group. That is typical of the Government's approach. We know that we will be carrying the vast majority of Scots and the unanimity of almost all those who work in housing when we go in the Lobby against the Bill. We will not be ashamed to do so.

Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith (Kincardine and Deeside): I have sat here for nearly two hours and I was beginning to wonder whether any of us from the Back Benches would have an opportunity to speak. I welcome the opportunity to do so.

I listened with care to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and I do not believe that he was wholly comfortable with his arguments all the time. I am left in some doubt about why the Labour party and, in particular, the Opposition Front Bench seek to divide the House. I always understood that Second Reading dealt with the principles of a Bill. With one or two exceptions I saw little concern about the principles in the Bill. There was a modified welcome for Scottish Homes, which was seen as a possible step forward, but we then ran into a whole series of what I would describe as nothing but pure Committee points. I am expecting an interesting and long Committee stage. However, simply to give us a catalogue of Committee points is not necessarily grounds to vote against the principles of the Bill. Therefore, I am left wondering why we should have a vote tonight. Perhaps, between now and 10 o'clock, it will be decided that there should be no such vote.

The one issue on which the hon. Member for Garscadden displayed concern was the principle that tenants in public housing should have the choice of landlord. However, even then the hon. Gentleman said that that choice was irrelevant because it would not work. That is hardly a point on which to divide the House. Thank goodness we have not had Labour stewardship of housing in the years since 1979. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has said, many tenants in Scotland today must be thankful for the opportunities that they have had as a result of the Government's policies and especially the right to buy—belatedly endorsed by the Labour party. Indeed, since 1979, there has been a 20 per cent. increase in the number of houses in private ownership.

I welcome the proposals in the Bill. Like my right hon. and learned Friend, I pay tribute to the work of the SSHA. That association has performed two roles in my constituency. For example, it encouraged the support of industrial development in the Aberdeen area following the exploitation of North sea oil. It undoubtedly made a major contribution in providing the necessary housing facilities.

Much more recently, the SSHA has been operating in the area of Garthdee of Aberdeen in my constituency where it was faced with a terrible problem of having to replace Orlit-type homes. That operation is now under way. At one time or another that operation has met with differences and difficulties, but it has been carried through with considerable sensitivity and understanding. I t that that operation will reach a proper conclusion. I tribute to what the SSHA has achieved not only i support of economic and industrial policies, but i sensitivity in looking after housing estates.

The Bill represents a perfectly sensible, nat evolution in the housing policy of recent years. I bel that the emphasis in the Bill is right, but I hope that right hon. and learned Friend remains committed mixed system of housing in Scotland. There is a rol the public sector in Scotland and it is one which has carried out well. Many tenants in my constituency w bear that out. Equally, with the scope and developme home ownership and the development of private tenan it is important, if we are to have a mixed system, that t sectors are healthy as well. At present I believe that right to encourage the private sector, but in our pol we should always seek to remain sensitive to the kin balance that we should have in the Scottish hou system.

I especially welcome the new, simplified structure the Bill introduces and the combination of the work o SSHA with the work of the Housing Corpora However, there are three matters that I should like to r My right hon. Friend has already given an assurance the right of a tenant to rent is as important as the rig the tenant to buy. I am grateful for that assurance must retain the security of those who wish to rema tenants. Every bit as much as my right hon. and lea Friend, I deprecate the scaremongering that has t place in recent months. I hope that my right hon. learned Friend will take every opportunity to make clear as he has in recent weeks that the security of te of those tenants, particularly SSHA tenants, wi maintained and respected. It means that, when we to the relevant parts of the Bill—for example, the to change the landlord and so on—it is important we scrutinise carefully the procedures that my right and learned Friend envisages.

I am glad that my right hon. and learned F referred to my second point at the beginning of his sp In our housing policy and in what we do after the Bi should be sure to take into account those whose need of a special nature. I am thinking particularly of the el and the disabled. My right hon. and learned Friend is to claim that enormous progress has been made in r years, particularly in the provision of sheltered hous commend the work of the housing associations, i operation with local authorities, in carrying that forward.

Much progress has been made, but much remains made, particularly in rural areas. The programm housing associations in rural areas was under t because available funds were allocated more to ar central Scotland than to rural areas and areas ou central Scotland. I am glad to say that the Ministe was then responsible for housing intervened and certain that proper allocation was made to rural ar

The provision of sheltered housing in rural ar every bit as important as what we try to do in renewal and in tackling the problems of some of the cities. Unless there is good provision of sheltered ho in rural areas, often the only choice to an individua move out with that community to institutional a modation, often many miles from where the indivi family and friends have lived. Therefore, the provis sheltered housing, even sometimes on a small scale, can make such a difference to the quality and continuity of life, which, in social terms, all of us in the House support. Therefore, I urge my right hon. and learned Friend to ensure that in the future and through the Bill we continue to be committed to an expansion of sheltered housing and housing for those with special needs, particularly in rural areas.

My third point is about the continuing role of housing associations. I have already paid tribute to their work in sheltered housing. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will be sensitive to two concerns of those associations. First, will he bear it in mind that they will work under a structure that is headed by Scottish Homes? There could be a conflict of interests. For example, how will the funds be allocated among the purposes of Scottish Homes, the housing associations and private landlords? My right hon. and learned Friend must look closely at that, to ensure that there is fairness in the allocation of funds to those who are working under the umbrella of Scottish Homes.

A further point was touched on by the hon. Member for Garscadden. There is concern among present tenants of housing associations that rents in publicly funded projects are likely to be lower than those in mixed funded projects, which one will see increasingly as a result of the Bill. Therefore, I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to look closely at the effects on the level rents of present tenants of housing associations.

I welcome the proposals. As the hon. Member for Garscadden said, there is scope for improvement and there will be several points to consider in Committee, but for the life of me I cannot understand why the House is being divided on the Bill.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): The right hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith) said that he gave a general welcome to the Bill, but some of the points that he made raised significant issues. There is plenty in the Bill with which Opposition Members fundamentally disagree, as I hope to show while supporting the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar).

Anyone representing a Scottish constituency, especially in Glasgow, must know that housing, along with unemployment, is the most serious social problem that we now have in Scotland. It takes up much of our constituency postbag and surgery work. There are immense problems for ordinary people in finding suitable and adequate accommodation at rents that they can afford. There are problems of the backlog of repairs in my constituency, of a modernisation programme that cannot progress fast enough because of lack of money, of dampness, homelessness, an acute shortage of sheltered accommodation, and the rest. The peripheral estates have particular problems. At the beginning of his speech, the Secretary of State mentioned them and said that one of the Government's objectives was to overcome them, and then conveniently did not mention them again during what was nearly an hour's speech.

All those problems are either directly caused or significantly aggravated by the fact that simply not enough finance is allowed to local authorities to deal with the housing problems with which they are faced. Because of the shortness of time I shall not mention too many statistics, but the Secretary of State's latest announcemen on public expenditure on housing in Scotland for 1988-8 was £639 million. In the current year the estimate expenditure, on the right hon. and learned Gentleman' own figures, will be £699 million. Therefore, even on thos figures there will be a reduction of £60 million in the nex year, in cash terms. In real terms or in constant terms, an at 1987-88 prices, housing support grant to loca authorities has gone down from £371 million in 1979-8 to £46 million in 1987-88. Those figures were given by th Secretary of State in a parliamentary answer to my hon Friend the Member for Garscadden on 3 July 1987. Th Under-Secretary of State is looking even more confuse than usual. He will find the information in the Offici Report for that date.

It is not difficult to understand why, apart from th general problems of local authorities, there is an increasin rent burden on local authority tenants. There is the absur result now that, in cities such as Glasgow, the considerabl majority of tenants are already on housing benefit and wi be affected by the more stringent rules that will b introduced in a month or two. Nothing in the Bill doe anything to remedy those problems, which are of crisi proportions in a city such as Glasgow.

The only proposal in the Bill that directly affects loca authorities is that the local authority tenant should hav the right to opt out of local authority tenure to some othe type of tenure. As has been said, the unfortunate privat tenant who is dissatisfied with his private landlord is no given the same opportunity to move out of private tenanc into local authority tenancy. I do not know of any privat tenant in my constituency who would not jump at th chance of being a tenant of the local authority.

If we are to give not only groups of tenants but, as th White Paper said, individual tenants the right to opt ou of local authority management, we shall cause chaos i housing management in a city such as Glasgow. Peopl can move out of normal local authority housin management into, for example, tenants' co-operative That is done with the co-operation and approval of th local authority and I strongly support it.

I am glad to say that developments in that area are no taking place in my constituency. There is a vast differenc between that and giving unrestricted rights, without an rights to the local authorities, to people to move out o local authority management. It cannot be good for eithe local authorities or tenants who are left in local authorit management. In many cases it will not be good for tenant who move out of local authority management either. Non of that will solve the real problems in housing, which som of us face from day to day in cities such as Glasgow an other areas.

I am not in the least persuaded or convinced tha Scottish Homes is a good idea, even if it were suggeste by a much more benevolent Government than the presen one, or by a Government who wanted co-operation wit local authorities, and not a Government such as this, wh are antagonistic to local authorities and are introducin Scottish Homes in order to take more and more power out of the hands of local authorities and put them into th hands of a body that will be directly nominated by th Secretary of State. It will operate under clause 2 directl under his authority, and will have no power to do anythin except what is in agreement with directions o arrangements laid down by the Secretary of State.

[Mr. Bruce Millan]

I have seen no case for putting together the Scottish bit of the Housing Corporation and the SSHA, and no case for giving these vast powers to Scottish Homes, which will be subject at every point to the control and authority of the Secretary of State. That is centralisation of a type that I strongly oppose. There is certainly a case for hiving off the Scottish bit of the Housing Corporation and creating an independent Scottish Housing Corporation. I see no reason why it should be part of a United Kingdom set-up, ultimately controlled from London. As far as I can see, there is no reason to set up an organisation such as Scottish Homes on the basis outlined in the Bill.

Why has there been a decline in the private rented sector? There a number of reasons: apart from anything else, most of the houses were slums. We welcome the Secretary of State's announcement of a reduction in the number of houses in Scotland that are below the tolerable standard—but they were all in the private sector. That is one reason why the number of houses in the private sector has decreased significantly in recent years—and a good thing, too. Even if I thought it desirable, I do not believe that the private rented sector in Scotland could be stimulated or encouraged in a way that would benefit significant numbers of people. The one thing that we know will inevitably follow from private finance being involved is that there must be a profit at the end of the day. The White Paper acknowledges that. That means that rents will have to increase significantly. There is no dispute about that.

We are not talking about minor increases in rents, which, incidentally, in the private sector under the fair rents system have increased in recent years faster than the increases in inflation. Of course, it would be possible to provide houses in the private sector and to keep rates at a reasonable level if public money went into Quality Street and the rest of the operators by way of subsidy. The possibility of that is provided for in the Bill. It was mentioned in paragraph 2.14 of the White Paper and is now provided for in clause 2. Is it the Government's intention to cut funds to local authorities, on the one hand, and to pump money into the hands of private developers in the private rented sector, on the other? That requires an answer. Clause 2, which is operated only by the direct authority of the Secretary of State, not by Scottish Homes, allows for it, so let us have some explanation.

What we know from the Bill is that new tenancies, whether wholly new or merely new because a house has changed hands, and assured or short assured tenancies will be at much higher rents than the present fair rents. In certain cases, security of tenure will be lost, and, with the phasing out of rent increases, the elimination of many of the rights of succession and the cuts in housing benefit, the prospects for the tenant who is still in the private sector, and for the prospective private tenant, are grim.

Of course, the process will be gradual; it will not happen overnight. The agony will not occur for everyone immediately, but it certainly will come to those who are tenants in the private sector. Only a small number of people are genuinely interested in private rented accommodation at any particular time, at the sort of rents that are likely to be levied under the Bill. Any ordinary person who can afford the sort of rents paid under the Bill will buy accommodation and get mortgage interest relief, which is a subsidy that is now overwhelmingly greater in Scotland than that given to council housing applying for mortgage interest relief, no one whether he is living in housing that is excessive to accommodation needs. One obtains the relief in It is offensive that that type of system sh introduced.

As regards excessive rents in the private introduced a private Member's Bill, with the su my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Sh (Mr. Marshall), to deal with the problem of scan exorbitant rents being levied in my constituen the Government blocked it. I am glad to say landlord in question is facing a charge of fraud. go into details, which is a pity, as I would like to s deal more about that landlord. My Bill, w Government blocked, would have provided prot the public purse, at the expense not of the tena is what the proposals will do, but of the unscrupulous, racketeering landlord. That is problem should have been tackled.

There are three excellent community-based associations in my constituency, and they are all worried about the Bill's contents. The board m the associations, who are ordinary people valuable time unpaid to do a service for the co are demoralised by the constant stream of docum have come out. They are extremely complicated damaging implications for community-based associations. They are worried about the new under assured tenancies and about the fact th will be living next door to one another, the one fair rent and the other paying a vastly increase tenancy rent.

The associations are worried about a probl which I shall be happy to be given an assuran Under-Secretary of State. If an existing tenant move into smaller accommodation becau excessively accommodated, he will lose the pro a fair rent and become an assured tenant, so he to move to smaller accommodation at a highe lose security of tenure. That will be the effect Does it make sense? It will stultify housing a management policies.

Overshadowing all, from the point of vi housing associations, is the fact that the G specifically intend to move away from the prese of calculating housing association grant. Th percentages are determined by an individual pro cases of new build in my constituency have had grant at a rate of more than 90 per cent., even fair rents are set at such a level that no one can houses unless he is on supplementary benefit. housing associations has calculated that if the su reduced to 70 per cent.—the sort of figur Government have in mind—the rents of th would double from £800 to £1,600. That is on number of things that are causing concern associations.

Not one tenant will fail to be adversely affe Bill. No local authority will be helped by the B will any housing association. The Bill does noth with the real problems of Scottish housing. Tha shall vote against it tonight.

7.9 pm

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I am afraid that we have had another negative speech from the Opposition. They just do not seem to realise that things change over the years. Never have they been more caught out than they were over the right to buy, which they resolutely opposed. They have had to reverse their policy and now realise that we were right all along. I find it disappointing that so few ideas come from the Opposition. It is always "No, no" and there is never a bright idea from any Opposition Member.

A happy family, a job and a home are the most important issues for anyone's quality of life. The only thing on which I agree with the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) is that there is much to do on housing. We know that from our surgeries and from our post bags. It is good to see a Bill that goes some way towards helping many people in Scotland to have better housing. If the Bill plays a part in achieving some of the objectives that I have mentioned, it will be welcome. Of course in Committee there must be clarification and development of policies, and we all accept that that stage of the Bill will be long and interesting.

My right hon. Friend spoke about why the Opposition oppose the Second Reading of the principle of having better homes in Scotland. As usual, the Opposition seem to be hanging on to the coat tails of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, which is also negative in its thinking. The Opposition have trumped up many non-existent objections and have frightened owner-occupiers, local authority tenants and tenants of Scottish Special Housing Association homes. They are creating the fear that the existing rights of tenants may be adversely affected, but nothing is further from the truth. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), who spends his parliamentary year making sedentary interruptions, will have plenty of time to speak, and no doubt during the winding-up speech he will hold forth. No doubt some hon. Members will listen to him.

Any changes that Scottish tenants may wish to make will be made voluntarily. The establishment of Scottish Homes is a big step forward, and the amalgamation will be beneficial. I see the new concept of alternative ownership and landlordship as of little significance, and I expect a cautious beginning. I welcome the other measures, and especially the interest that the Government have shown in house improvements during the years that they have been in office. That is important, and I hope that the Government will continue to make efforts to see that much money goes into the non-HRA sector for housing improvement.

The changes in tenancies of private accommodation and the extension of the right to purchase local authority houses are welcome. Good houses must begin with good planning. I hope that we will set our sights a good deal higher than we set them in the post-war period in housing construction and architecture, and that we will get away from the high-rise flats, which have been a disaster in most areas, and from other unattractive housing schemes that we see dotted around the United Kingdom. We should be cautious about developing more flats in Scotland, because they frequently require a high management input in order to retain a reasonable environment. I hope that we will think carefully and give good advice to local authorities that ask about the improvement of whole housing It is sad to see good council house schemes that have to a lower environmental standard than we want t

Management and, of course, the advice of coun also covers waiting lists. I hope that the Bill will enab to grow shorter, because they are still far too long. I s like to see a much more sympathetic approach to who, for one reason or another, leave tied houses. authorities frequently feel that they can take no until there is a sheriff's order for eviction. That is a winded and unsympathetic approach towards a who has to leave a tied house, often for good re before he can be considered for a local authority h

Flats are a stepping stone towards getting on to t for a self-contained house. We should not encoura construction of flats, although, of course, an incr number of single people want such accommodatio unfortunately, nowadays an increasing numb divorced people want accommodation. Sometime are the only solution. We should think carefully building single-bedroom accommodation for e people and pensioners. We should never build house fewer than two bedrooms, because a tenant with a bedroom is unable to ask anyone to stay and to m a family home. We should aim to have nothing s than two-bedroom accommodation for our elderly p

I welcome the change in the policy of the Dumfri Galloway planning authority, in that it is now tak much more flexible approach to planning i countryside. As my hon. Friend the Minister kn have always thought that we must try to develop h in the country in the right place and of the right desig materials. We must do that if we are to keep people in the countryside, and that will encourage the schools, village halls and churches. Some pla authorities took a restrictive attitude to the 1960 pla circular which allowed buildings in the countryside they were attached to agriculture or forestry. That co is now years out of date, because neither of thos worthy industries wants additional housing. In any the majority of foresters in the Forestry Commissio in the forestry companies prefer to live in the town to go out daily to work.

Now that the Government have given a lead by 1985 circular, and more recently by their suppo alternative uses for agricultural land, we must be all to develop in the hamlets, in the villages and i countryside itself — provided that the building suitable and comply with the criteria on standards have mentioned. There has been a long battle to about this change of heart, but I am glad that i happened and look forward to the development of h in the countryside.

It is right that we should concentrate as mu possible on owner-occupation of the new developn and our encouragement of mortgage relief for o occupiers is of the greatest importance. It must n overlooked when debating a Bill such as this.

My last point on planning is that we must enco planning authorities to make land available for bu — whether the building is local authority or pr Unless we do that we will not make much progress to resolving the housing problem. Of course we encourage gap sites and other good sites in the context, but if we have to go to the fringes, so be it. The land must be available and we must ensure that services can be made readily available too.

We must continue to provide maximum help with improvement grants. This is particularly true when reconstructing houses in the countryside that have been derelict for some time. The support that my right hon. and learned Friend will give this matter and to housebuilding generally will be most beneficial to the construction industry, which always has spare capacity and represents a good way of providing jobs for people in Scotland.

My right hon. and learned Friend's concept of Scottish homes is a major step forward. I have a high regard for the SSHA, the Housing Corporation and other housing associations. It is right to bring them together under one hat. There must have been many grey edges, so putting them together under incisive management will be a tremendous help to the present housing stock and in co-ordinating with local authorities to build in the right place in the future.

I welcome the housing association developments in Dumfries and Galloway, whether by the Hanover housing association, Kirk Care or the British Legion, but particularly by Loreburn housing association, which has made remarkable strides during the past five years, after its inception through the Holywood Trust and the work of the Keswick family. There have been great benefits to Dumfries and Galloway. There have been many inaginative developments, both separately and in conjunction with local authorities, mainly for special needs.

My right hon. and learned Friend highlighted the importance of housing for the handicapped and those with special needs. Here again, there has been some fine quality of design and attractive architecture, on which we must congratulate the housing associations. They have made great strides in the last 10 years. I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend will encourage Scottish Homes to continue the work of the housing associations in Scotland.

Over the past three financial years the Government have increased substantially resources for local authority housing—by more than £150 million. The allocation for 1988-89 should be a record both on the HRA and the non-HRA.

I hope that this trend will continue, because much improvement is needed, particularly in local authority housing, to deal with condensation and dampness. The Select Committee on Scottish Affairs considered these problems, and the sooner they can be eradicated, the better.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will clarify a point that was mentioned by my right hon. and learned Friend about the right to buy post-1979 houses and the outstanding debt. Local authorities do not know where they stand on this matter. If we consider the simple equation of a £30,000 house discounted by 60 per cent. to £12,000, there is a debt of £18,000. Many occupiers of post-1979 houses want to know where they stand, so my right hon. and learned Friend should tell us how the debt will be funded and what incentives there will be for post-1979 tenants.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) asked whether a local authority could be an approved person under the terms of the Bill. I noted my right hon. and learned Friend's answer. He fel very unlikely. The local authorities in my const be interested in his answer.

The most important issue tonight is to bri everyone what a great opportunity the Bi Scotland for local authority housing and for It will be a good Bill by the time we have cons detail in Committee, on which Opposition M look forward to serving. I suspect that the ho for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) will be Committee. I hope that the Opposition and C see that their attack on the Bill is quite unfoun that we can put forward a constructive Bi provide more and better homes in Scotland.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berw always enjoy following the hon. Member for D H. Monro) in these debates. He concluded t provided a great opportunity for housing in Sc I think quite the reverse. This is a sa opportunity. The balance of the argument consultation process has shown that to be fullness of time, history, too, will show it to

The areas of Scottish housing requiring attention are self-evident to most hon. Mem there are acute housing shortages in local Secondly, there are real problems reg affordability of rents, and that position will b more difficult when the planned housing ben are introduced in April. Thirdly, disrepair, inc conditions as condensation and dampness hand, and the general lack of local auth available for improvement grants on the othe condition of the housing stock in Scotland concern.

Since I was elected to the House, I have be get the Government to undertake a house cond north of the border. [Interruption.] I do no claim exclusively for myself, as I am reminded Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robe a survey would enable us to measure the extent which we cannot do at the moment. The Gov that local authority returns are sufficient for and that a house condition survey would cost spread over a period and with a rolling pr would inform our debates in a way that is no the moment.

There is also real concern about special ne We have mentioned only briefly the fu important issue of homelessness, which concerns people north of the border, particul cities as Edinburgh and Glasgow. The situat an urgent and strategic overall campaig provided us with an opportunity to do th Government appear to have missed it.

I have no quarrel with the Secretary of Stat to improve the peripheral estates. I was born near Easterhouse and, when I go back there, has become a much more rundown clapped-ou it was when I went to school there. We must be that problem. I also agree with the Secretary an increase in home ownership is much need

The Secretary of State's third objective of of tenure is also laudable. However, I wonde his heart of hearts, the Secretary of State thi

Bill will effect real improvements in relation to any of the three objectives. Those objectives cannot be attained unless all public, private and voluntary sector agencies are brought into play and a policy of diverse initiatives is set up and adequately financed with public and private money. There is no evidence that, in the tenure of this Administration, enough finance has been directed through local authorities to try to achieve some of those objectives.

It was argued that the Bill deals with important ideas. I do not dissent from any of them in principle. There is some sense in a unified housing agency. I subscribe to the view stated by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). He said that the Housing Corporation north of the border was in an anomalous position and could have benefited from a proper measure of unification with the SSHA along the lines of the Scottish Development Agency and given a co-ordinating and enabling role in Scottish housing. There is no objection to that. My party believes that diversification of tenure and a greater contribution from the private sector are not objectionable.

The only sensible way in which we can get a greater role for private finance in Scottish housing is to move to a mixed financial basis in a housing association context, bringing in Quality Street for example, and some other bodies.

In the special circumstances that apply in Scotland, we shall never be able to get an actual economic return for private landlords. It is not possible. The prevailing conditions in Scotland are quite different from those south of the border. One aspect that runs subliminally through the Bill is that we are moving in an ever more English direction, with some of the ideas and nostrums that ooze out of the clauses of the Bill. We must be aware of that. We must cater for our own special circumstances in Scotland in our own way.

The ideas and concepts in the Bill are welcome enough, but they are not of primary importance; rather, they are of secondary importance. Neither are they being deployed in an ordered and well-thought-out way. Even the potentially useful ideas in the Bill are being deployed in such a way as would render them inefficient, irrelevant, or, as the hon. Member for Garscadden argued, positively damaging in practice not only to private sector tenants but to public sector tenants.

I subscribe to the point that was made about the way in which the consultation timetable was organised. It was objectionable. I do not make a party political point—in the past, Governments of all parties have done it—but it appears now to happen more frequently. We should lay down a marker and strongly protest about the way in which the consultation process was gone through with such apparent disregard for public opinion. That is how it looks.

This is yet another enabling Bill. It is big enough; there are enough clauses and schedules to keep us busy until Easter. Enabling measures should be objectionable to the House of Commons. They leave an inordinate amount of power in the hands of the Government. I understand that schedule 1 is long, but the detail of the structure of Scottish Homes, which is of fundamental importance, is not set out in the Bill. Will there be decentralisation? Will there be regional committees? Will such regional committees consist of representatives of consumers and providers? Will there be a two-tier structure? None of those matters has been properly answered in the schedule deali the setting up of Scottish Homes. That does not be a helpful way to approach a Bill of this nature

The financial role of the new Scottish Homes left in limbo. How will it fulfil its funding role? Wi be an earmarked grant from central Government t be broken down for housing associations, the private landlords and developers, or will there be a capital allocation to be split up under the directio board of management? All such questions unanswered. I agree with the hon. Member for Gas This is an important Bill and it is quite wro Parliament should be presented with such a vague primary legislation.

The Bill is also objectionable in principle beca yet another move at the hands of this Government t centralisation without any real accountability. Th be regretted.

I shall briefly sketch some of my concerns a some have already been well aired by other hon. M No doubt, since I have been lucky enough to cat eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, I shall be on the hit nomination to the Standing Committee. I look for whiling away many hours. Hon. Members must be that the debate is not guillotined, leaving large ch the legislation undiscussed. There must be restrain Opposition side and some sensible business mana on the Government's side. If I am nominated Committee—

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): T Gentleman may be nominated as the Whip.

Mr. Kirkwood: I may indeed at this rate be no as the Whip.

It is important to pace the work of the Comm that all schedules and clauses of the Bill receive consideration.

I listened carefully to the Government's case. down to the fact that, in their view, the Bill will choice. But will there be equal choice for all? I do n that there will be. Will there be effective, real choi for example, under clause 40, a tenant will lose to buy in certain circumstances? What choices doe contain for the homeless, the young, the low-p those who have special housing needs? What ch there for existing SSHA tenants? I raised the point Secretary of State. A process of consultation with SSHA tenants could have been undertaken in a thorough and comprehensive way. It would have the difficulty in which the Government n themselves.

Another question relates to cost. Over the months, the Under-Secretary of State has attende of conferences. I give him due credit for that. He quoted as saying:

"Scottish Homes is not intended as a device fo public expenditure."

Will that be true? I fear that the Bill is a device t proportion or public expenditure of gross product devoted to housing. We can all be cle statistics. It is easy to make selective points wh statistics. If the Bill means that, in totality, the pr of public money and the country's wealth that is to using housing north of the border is reduced, deeply regrettable. I suspect that it will happen, but I am willing to listen to any reassurance that the Minister might give.

I wish to ask the Minister a specific question about housing associations. Housing associations in my part of the world are concerned that if rent levels in the publicly funded sector are to be determined in line with mixed funded sector rents — that is, where there is a combination, whether it be with Nationwide, Quality Street, or whatever — there is a guarantee that present rents will increase. Surely that cannot be a good thing. If I have that point wrong, I should be happy if the Under-Secretary of State would disabuse me.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): Will the hon. Gentleman accept that the rents of housing association tenants who remain in the same house will continue to be registered by the rent officer?

Mr. Kirkwood: I know that. That is like saying tomorrow is Tuesday. I accept that; I am talking about the future. Perhaps we can discuss that point in Committee.

If the Bill is a means of cutting public expenditure on housing, that is regrettable. If capital investment had been maintained at the level of 1978-79 in real terms, local authorities would, according to my statistics, have an additional £817 million to invest this year, which is a substantial sum of money. Local authorities in the Borders are having difficulty in trying to work out what money will be available for housing improvement, because they have been told that they can spend on improvement grants only what they take in next years receipts from the houses they sell. A crystal ball would be needed to determine that, so it makes sensible public authority planning impossible.

The Scottish Council for Single Homeless, which I am sure has made representations to the Minister—it has to me — has argued that although single homeless youngsters aged 16 to 17 will have rights, because of the statutory duty of local authorities to pay attention to their housing needs, they will be priced out of the market by the combination of housing benefit cuts and other supplementary benefit changes. Although they will have a statutory right to a tenancy, they will be left with only £6·20 to pay for food, clothing and other needs. That is a ridiculous position for them.

I am worried—because in 1986 I served on the Social Security Bill Committee — about those under 25 years who are north of the border. They will face financial prejudice.

I do not want to rehearse yet again the arguments about the invidious position of rent officers having to decide on the appropriate level of housing benefit and whether houses are too large or too luxurious. Rent officers will be put in a ridiculously impossible position. There will be a direct conflict of interest, which is a new and worrying departure. I will want to look very carefully at the detail of clause 64 in Committee, and homelessness and special needs must also be properly attended to in Committee to make the Bill acceptable.

The hon. Member for Dumfries made the important point about the special housing needs of those in rural areas. I hope that the Under-Secretary will say a word or two to reassure the relatively small but hard-working and conscientious housing associations in are borders area and Dumfries and Galloway needs should be met.

The Bill, if it is anything, is a missed opp fulness of time I fear that the Bill, and any which comes from the Government — Government may say to the contrary— proportion of the nation's wealth devoted will accelerate the drift towards an E housing, which is totally inappropriate to c of the border and will be seen to run down by district councils in providing housing. I I hope that in Committee the Governme some of the points made in this debate.

Friend the I have had correspondence with him follo tions from the Barrhead and Neilsto tenants only a few days ago, and constituents. There has been considerable ing among ordinary tenants. I read the o on this point. I did not think that the origi wholly felicitous, but it is an object lesson, is any possible misinterpretation of the opportunity to see a dark Tory co basically innocuous wording, the Labour —[Interruption.] I am referring to the rights of existing tenants; the wording o document was splendid.

The hon. Member for Garscadden sai of local authority housing in Scotland wa must recognise that gross capital expend in Scotland in recent years has increased sharply. The hon. Member for Garscadden did not give way to me in his speech—I make no complaint about that—but I was going to point out that under the Labour Government, from 1974 to 1979, gross capital expenditure on housing in Scotland fell by 37 per cent. in real terms. It has gone up by 14 per cent. in real terms since 1979. More local authority houses were modernised and improved in Scotland in 1986 than in any of the previous 10 years. Since 1979 in Scotland 30 per cent. of local authority housing stock has been modernised, and in the private sector the improvement and repair grants have been substantially increased, and rightly so, under this Government.

Some hon. Members have referred to the role of the Scottish Special Housing Association, and I underline its achievements. As a good example of the expertise of the SSHA in special needs housing, there is the local shelter housing project in Barrhead which was opened recently. That is a good example of what the SSHA can do and of the kind of expertise and experience that it will bring to a unified agency.

The housing associations have, of course, had an important role in the west of Scotland and also in rural areas, but there is something in the argument that the housing associations in some areas may be reaching the limits of their technology. I would see them as having a role in encouraging shared ownership. I would also like to see the extension of other forms of tenure, such as co-operatives, although no one should be under any misapprehension that it is necessarily easy and straightforward always to set up a tenants' co-operative.

In the local authority sector, we are moving from the era of quantity objectives to that of quality objectives. It is a tragedy that the houses in many estates in Scotland, substantial parts of which are difficult to let or are unlettable, are not old. They have been built within the past generation. So what is needed is a move to encourage greater mobility of council tenants—the average owner-occupier moves once every seven years, but, because of the present system, local authority tenants inevitably find it much more difficult to move — and also private investment and new forms of tenure.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will agree with me that when we talk about bringing private investment into these areas we are talking not about the popular council schemes but about the unpopular ones, where there is a clear role for dynamic private sector initiatives. I emphasise, too, that improving the physical stock in many of these problem estates is not in itself enough; it must be part of a general programme of environmental improvement. That is where the unified housing agency will help, because, as I understand the present legislation, the Scottish Special Housing Association has that kind of power but the Housing Corporation does not. The new agency will have that power. I hope also that Scottish Homes in these areas will work closely with the Scottish Development Agency which now has an important role in focusing on the economic development of some of our peripheral estates.

As regards the private sector, I emphasise a crucial point—that private finance is not necessarily the same as private control. There are opportunities to bring in private finance in a number of ways. There is considerable potential for expansion of the private rented sector. We have 130,000 empty houses in Scotland. Some of them are empty because their owners are reluctant to under the present legislation. There is undoub in some areas for the expansion of the private the only way to achieve that is to ensure reason for those who make the investment. That is The hon. Member for Garscadden said that principle, in favour of the expansion of the pr but it will not happen unless those who are investment get a reasonable return on it.

Such a process will, I the full support of the House, and I am sure is a major step towards that end.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): I to follow the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr what he said, but I part company with him noticed it—when it comes to the experienc 1950s and 1960s with multi-storey flats and d particularly in my native city of Glasgow. having long, tedious arguments with the then the city council when I opposed such develo not being wise after the event, but I think tha problems in the so-called peripheral areas understandable needs of that time. consultative document. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) drew attention to these differences. Therefore, any responsibility for engendering fear in the minds of SSHA tenants rests with the Secretary of State and his Department.

I see no reason to bring these two bodies together, the Housing Corporation and the SSHA. The SSHA's submission to the Secretary of State is a bit vague in its reasoning for supporting the unification of the two bodies. As I understand it, the Housing Corporation of Scotland goes along with it because it wants to divorce itself or have some devolution from its English and Welsh counterparts. That is understandable, but it is not a reason for bringing together two bodies which are so disparate and which have opposing, if not conflicting, functions. One body has a financial, promotional function, while the other has a building, planning and execution function in relation to housing. The Government have decided to bring together those two bodies, perhaps because they wished it, but I can see nothing in that merger which will regenerate Scottish housing.

My hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden said that all the present activity in Glasgow, some of which is imaginative and dynamic, is happening in advance of the Bill, not because of it.

Mr. Home Robertson: In spite of it.

Mr. Douglas: I would not necessarily agree with that. The merger of the two bodies is not necessary to achieve what is happening now in Glasgow.

The Secretary of State spent eight minutes dealing with three points in relation to the future of Scottish housing. He mentioned peripheral housing estates, especially in urban areas. I wish to mention some areas in my constituency — some of my hon. Friends will have similar experiences—which are neither urban nor rural. They are the mining communities, whose heart and dynamism reside in the pits. I understand that a decision has been taken to close Seafield. That means that there will be no working pit in Fife. I could bore the House by mentioning all the mining communities whose heart and sould have been torn out. They include Valleyfield, Bogside, Oakley and Comrie. The reason for their existence has gone, but the social fabric has not been entirely eliminated. I have great pride in representing mining communities, and I know that the social cohesion still exists, although the reason for their existence has disappeared.

In any future review of Scottish housing, the Government must pay attention to mining communities. It is not enough to say, as the Secretary of State did, that housing is an important consideration and planning is different. The Government must make resources available to local district councils to help with housing and planning. Last Friday, I met officials of Dunfermline district council to discuss Steelend, where the houses belong not to the local authority but to British Coal. The estate was sold en bloc, and the local authority can do almost nothing because it does not have the resources.

I was born in Govan. Although housing conditions there were difficult and, in some cases, deplorable, we had points of reference to which we could look up. Govan town hall is a magnificent building. But the people of Oakley and Valleyfield have no buildings in which to have some pride. The Government must m resources for housing. It is not enoug houses are vacant. Some of the house area of Dunfermline, which were built 3 be knocked down. There should be m that estate, but the local authority resources to provide them.

I see nothing in the Bill — the State will correct me if I am wrong— our serious housing difficulties. It wou years after the destruction caused by th we still had not improved the standard course, there have been some improve expectations and desire for comfort h

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North) rose——

Hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Walker: It would seem that Opposition Members do not greet my speech with the greatest of enthusiasm.

First, let me say to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) that we all understand the dreadful problems that occur when the source of employment that has created the fabric of a community disappears from it. Such change cannot take place easily or without pain, and no one can say that it is not likely to have a long-term impact on the community, whose recovery can be a tortuous and difficult process. When the Government came to office in 1979, we did not inherit a situation of which we as a nation could be proud. The housing problems in Scotland were legion and enormous. Those problems were often referred to by Opposition Members, not least in some of the many fine speeches of a man who is sadly missed in the House—Mr. Hugh Brown, the late hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan, who brought to the House much experience of local authority work, particularly in housing. He also brought to the House a realistic view—something that is missing from some Opposition Members' contributions.

Hugh Brown recognised the enormous problems, some of which were of local authorities' own making. Some of them resulted from the misuse of scarce resources, and some arose because although local authorities were genuinely concerned to do something, they could not achieve what was being attempted. In such cases, the end result was an improvement on the previous state of affairs, but it was not good enough. Time moved on and successive administrations, both local and national, inherited the problems.

If we are to use the nation's resources wisely and well, we must recognise that we need to channel them to where the need is greatest. The Government have recognised that, if we are to assist those who are in need—as we should and must—we must ensure that resources are channelled correctly. We must ensure that resources are not splattered over a wide area so that those who really need them do not feel the effects. We set about channelling resources—for example, through housing benefit—to those who really needed them.

The policies of successive councils—the majority of them Labour councils—of charging low rents often starved those councils of funds that could have been available. First, many people could have afforded to pay realistic rents and, secondly, an increase in rents could have come directly from the housing benefit system. Local authorities' failure to charge realistic rents brought about enormous cash flow problems.

Throughout Scotland the results of such cash flow problems are staring us in the face. Those of us who have examined properties for damp and condensation are horrified to think that in a civilised society people can be asked to live in houses in such bad condition. People's dreams of moving into houses with bathrooms and with adequate provision for their children were turned into nightmares. They found condensation an walls, and their children suffered bronchi a result of the damp conditions in which

That was a result of the absence of ade into the housing coffers. — [Interrup nowhere in this life if we do not recognise t citizens live in conditions in which they living. People ought not to be living in when their houses are public property problems—I do not say all of them—re mistaken policy of imagining that one cou a council housing system without charging to cover repair and maintenance.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryh Gentleman says that he sympathises with damp houses, houses with dangerous wir Did he oppose the Government's move to support grant to Glasgow district counci and remove that grant completely from Scottish councils, as well as cutting capit

Mr. Walker: As is so often the Opposition Members, the hon. Lady con funds when allocated with the way in whi budgeted for.

I return to my point. If, over a perio or even 10 years—realistic rents had be the balance had been made up from th through the various support systems now benefit, that money would have been cha into the housing coffers. That is the firs adequate funds could have been found people who could afford to pay full rents s them. I make no apology for saying tha would have been the most sensible and logi resources.

I am sure that Opposition Member different from mine. I want all the citizens to live in accommodation of which we can certainly not proud of the conditions in authorities have asked many of my constitu local authorities are good local authori deny that—but also in my constituency, council had enormous problems. It would pretend that it did not. However, the pr new. I remember looking at Fintry when a council candidate in Dundee. The secon houses were in the wrong place. They we from the places where the majority of peo it was obvious that the cost of travel woul and would deter many people. Fintry was built long before many of the other housing schemes in Dundee which have even greater problems. The lessons of Fintry were lost.

I do not say that everything that the Government have done since coming to office has been right, because that would be nonsense. However, the majority of the action that we have taken on housing was long overdue. Even today we have the massive problem of houses standing empty. However, whereas 120,000 houses were below tolerable standards 10 years ago, we have brought that figure down to 55,000. That is a move in the right direction, but the target must be to eliminate the problem altogether.

I also welcome the substantial increase in sheltered housing. This again involves targeting scarce resources where they are most needed. Clearly, we must cater for the disabled and the elderly, but the old blanket provisions paid insufficient attention to this. Resources have been channelled into sheltered accommodation, often through housing associations, and I compliment the associations in my constituency on the splendid schemes that they have developed. Those schemes are working well and the tenants are happy, as I know from regular visits to them, because the only way to find out what is happening is to go and see for oneself. The increase in sheltered housing and accommodation for the disabled shows that the Government have been channelling scarce resources in the right direction.

Another welcome development is that 106,000 families have been able to buy their own homes. One dream that has turned into reality and not into a nightmare is the opportunity for people to have a stake in their own homes. The Opposition may ask what that really means. To people who grew up in council homes it means that for the first time they will have a nest egg to leave to their families, an opportunity which they never enjoyed before, because it simply did not exist for them. Today, 106,000 households in Scotland have that opportunity as a direct result of legislation that was opposed by the Labour party.

Home ownership does more than give people a stake in their homes. It changes attitudes. One has only to look at the estates to see the evidence—new doors, porches and windows, improved gardens and decreased vandalism. That alone would be a good enough reason to sell the houses. I sometimes wonder whether the discounts are big enough, because the benefits to the community are enormous. The people with whom I grew up in Alloway terrace in Linlathen dreamed of owning their homes and being part of the community, of owning a car and a television set. All those things are coming to pass because the Government are channelling resources in the right direction.

One of the benefits of the Bill will be to bring together the two major housing agencies. That is important, because in my view we have reached a crossroads where we must change direction and go not for quantity but for quality. The first and major challenge is to improve the quality of the existing housing stock. Secondly, we must ensure that the houses being built meet the special needs of the community. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) said, we welcome the efforts to improve and regenerate peripheral housing schemes in the cities, because they are desperately needed in many areas, but we must also recognise the need for regeneration in rural areas.

We hear a great deal from the Opposition about unemployment, but in one part of my constituency there is a problem brought about by full employment. In Aberfeldy, firms cannot find workers because of inadequate housing resources. More houses need to be built in that area. In the initial stages, the need is often for housing at economic rents. That is another welcome benefit that could come out of the Bill.

We also hear a great deal about the availability of building workers. This, too, will be effected by the Bill. My hon. Friend the Minister will be interested to hear that for the past three months, on Monday mornings, I have been calling on the various places of employment in my constituency to discover the true employment situation. A consistent factor for companies in the building industry has been the dearth of building workers in north Tayside, so in my area at least, the stories about building workers on the dole are pure fairy tales. I am told that there is also a shortage of skilled building workers in the Dundee area.

The Bill will provide opportunities to widen the forms of tenure and letting. This, too, has attracted some hostility from the Opposition. Many of them must have faced the problem of finding rented accommodation at some time in their lives. Council house waiting lists always involved special qualifications or long waits, so for the young, ambitious person who was willing to move, the real problem was not finding a job, but finding accommodation near the available work at a rent that he or she could afford. I have certainly experienced that problem.

I should have thought that in the 40 years since I first tried to find rented accommodation the problem would have been solved, but it has not been solved, because, as a matter of policy, successive Labour Governments deliberately squeezed out the private sector landlords. I have no brief for Rachman-type landlords, but when I was a young man there were a substantial number of private lettings in Dundee.

The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) suggested that they were slums, but he should know better because, like me, he knows Dundee well. He knows that immediately before and after the war, although there were slums in Dundee which needed to be, and were, removed, there were many private sector rented properties which were beautiful flats in first-class tenement buildings. That accommodation was forced out of the private rented sector by successive Labour Governments, so more and more people were deprived of the opportunity to rent such properties.

I also welcome the idea of management schemes and co-operatives. I do not object to something just because it is called a co-operative. Unlike the Opposition, I do not have such hang-ups. I believe that things should be judged on their merits — whether they are viable and an improvement on the present situation, and whether they provide increased choice and wider options. I therefore believe that there is scope for co-operatives, and I welcome their development. I also welcome the fact that the private sector will be encouraged to become involved in areas which so far have been the exclusive province of the public sector.

I am aware that a substantial number of Opposition Members wish to speak, so I shall conclude. I believe that my contribution has clearly shown that I welcome the Bill, because there is much in it that will give hope, much that will bring about change, and much that will be welcomed in Scotland, just as the right to buy was when we introduced it some years ago, but it was equally resisted by Opposition Members. I believe that in about five or six years those voices on the Opposition Benches—the same voices and the same faces will still be there on Opposition Benches — will be saying, "We are modifying our stance," just as they did about the right to buy. Experience will show that the Bill contains much that will be beneficial to the people who really matter, the people of Scotland.

8.30 pm

Mr. Jimmy Dunnachie (Glasgow, Pollok): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for granting me the opportunity to speak on the Bill, which is one of the most serious issues facing the Scottish people. The Bill has created great anxiety in my constituency. It is a direct attack on meagre resources and basic rights. It is not a real solution to the major housing problems in Scotland. It is instead an attack on the power of local authorities in Scotland.

Encouraging private bodies or companies to invest in rented housing will not solve Scotland's major housing problem. It will not do anything for the 200,000 people who are on the local housing lists. It will do little to cure the dampness which is a health hazard that affects the homes of 120,000 Scottish children. The Bill will not ease the plight of the 31,000 people who are homeless in Scotland. That figure is rising every week. Instead, the Bill will punish the local authorities for the good work which, despite the lack of funds, they have already begun. I refer to Glasgow district council and the great assistance that it has given to housing associations, tenants, co-operatives and par-value co-operatives.

The Bill will turn the clock back to the dark old days of the private landlord and will take away the benefits of post-war housing policy in cities such as Glasgow. In 1947 about 65 per cent. of all rented accommodation in Scotland was in the private sector and the vast majority were slums, without hot water, baths or toilets. Few repairs were done because all that the landlord was interested in was profit. Amidst all that housing squalor, a Labour Government empowered local authorities to embark on a massive building programme of council houses. That gave hope to many people in Scotland—a hope which had previously been denied them because they had been forced to live in private rented housing. However, this Government want to return to a system that produced yesterday's slums.

Indeed, the Government want to go further and to create a two-tier tenants structure, which will further widen the gap that already exists between the haves and the have-nots in today's society. The first type of tenant will be able to afford to pay a fair and economic rent. At least in theory, that tenant should be able to get repairs done. However, the second class of tenant created by the Tories is not so fortunate. He will be deemed unable to pay a fair and economic rent and will get little or no help with housing repairs. That will create ghettoes instead of inner-city regeneration that the Government promised last June. The unemployed, low-wage earners, single parent families, senior citizens and the homeless will all be sacrificed for the Tory principles which dictate that private investment must be rewarded with fat profits.

Both types of tenant lack a further security. There is nothing in the Bill to prevent unscrupulous landlords from increasing rents and refusing to carry out repairs. The Bill also brings back the fear of eviction. A landlord can apply for an order to evict a tenant for non-payment of rent or, indeed, for a record of late payment.

There is a further lack of security in the area of tenancy rights, which has been left rather vague in the Bill because it is open to landlord manipulation. What of the concept of Scottish Homes? Again, that is a further attack on local authorities, which, in the past, have stopped Governments imposing financial penalties on people who can ill afford to pay them. The Bill means that a democratically elected housing authority will be replaced by a Government-sponsored quango. The people who will form that body will follow Tory housing policies, irrespective of the hardship and the suffering that they will cause their fellow men and women. The entire goal is a giant step towards an erosion of democracy and social justice in what was once a caring society. Therefore, I ask the House to oppose the Bill.

8.35 pm

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): We seem to have run out of Conservative Members, but other Opposition Members wish to speak so I shall be as succinct as possible to allow in as many other hon. Members as possible.

The Government's stated White Paper objectives on which the Bill is based were reasonable and deserved support. It is a worthwhile objective to give people a wider choice in housing, to improve the supply and quality of that housing, to encourage greater individual responsibility for, and control over, the conditions in which people live and to provide the means of dealing with the problems of homelessness. I am sure that all those objectives will gain support and be encouraged by all hon. Members. [Interruption.] As has been rightly pointed out, I am afraid that I must advise the Minister that he is alone. There is certainly not a Scot on his side of the House but he appears to have the support of an English colleague and reserves from Penrith are arriving.

Although the Bill's aims are desirable, the reality is that it does not deliver those worthy objectives. Worse than that, in comparison with the enormity of the actual housing problems in Scotland, the Bill is an enormous missed opportunity. Indeed, it is more important for what it misses out and what it does not do than for the quango that it creates.

We do not get much chance to legislate on Scottish matters and I regret that the Government have wasted this valuable opportunity to do something worth while about Scottish housing. There is nothing in the Bill which seriously tackles the major problems in Scottish housing. There is nothing in the Bill to tackle the growing problem of homelessness in Scotland, which has risen by almost 100 per cent. during the past four years. Indeed, as the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Dunnachie) said, the Shelter survey states that 31,000 Scottish families and individuals are now homeless.

However, in the White Paper the Government used the word "residual" to describe the homelessness situation. One man's residue is clearly another man's desperation. How does the Minister justify that statement when all our local authorities are facing the reality of demographic, social and other changes which are creating growing numbers of young, single and other homeless persons?

Nothing in the Bill addresses the 35 per cent. growth in housing waiting lists during the past few years. An estimated 200,000 people are now waiting for housing in Scotland. So far, the Government's response has been simply to restrict the market by selling council houses and simultaneously starving councils of the funds required to build alternative replacements.

There is nothing in the Bill about the national problem of overcrowding. About one in four Scottish people—1·25 million of our fellow citizens — still live in conditions of overcrowding. In Shelter's words:

"Overcrowding in Scotland is at levels which existed elsewhere in Britain twenty or thirty years ago."

However, the Government tell us that all is well and that those problems have been solved.

There is nothing in the Bill about a national house condition survey. If there is any ideal activity for a unified housing agency, perhaps that is it—it should produce such a survey. Evidence from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities suggests that about 250,000 council houses need full modernisation and a further 250,000 require remedial treatment for dampness and condensation. In other words, 500,000 council houses in Scotland require positive action now. One would never have believed that that situation existed from anything that was said by the Secretary of State for Scotland. However, that situation exists and if any unified housing agency is worth its salt, that is the sort of thing that it should look at and deal with. Again, the Bill does nothing to solve those problems. Indeed, the opposite is true.

The Government's policy is merely to sell or remove the best council houses cheaply and to give no housing support grant funding to improve the remainder. In reality, the Government do not have a policy for council houses. We are entitled to ask the Minister to explain how these provisions will assist in meeting Scotland's major housing problems. Will his proposals for Scottish Homes, for the transfer of tenants out of the public sector and for altering the law of tenancy build more houses, reduce the housing waiting lists, house the growing numbers of homeless people or cure the problems caused by overcrowding and dampness which afflict such a large number of Scottish houses? Will the Bill achieve that?

I was a co-sponsor of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 and I believe that it should now be updated, strengthened and improved after a decade in operation. Local authorities have a statutory obligation to house the homeless, yet they are being starved of the resources to carry out that task. What exactly will Scottish Homes contribute to housing the homeless, and how will it do it? I should like the Minister to state clearly how these measures will assist in increasing the supply of special needs housing. If there is no statutory obligation to do so, how will the measures ease the problem of homelessness?

If the Government's objective is to produce high-quality, rented houses at a low cost, that is possible, but only with suitable central Government financial assistance. If the objective is to produce high quality, rented houses at high rents, how exactly is that possible in Scotland, given the long history of high unemployment and low wages among the very sections of the population who most need that same, better-quality rented housing?

Under the Bill, rents will inevitably increase. They cannot do anything else if profits are to be made by private investors. Yet the Government's economic policies, by destroying large sectors of the Scottish economy, prevent people from affording those rents in the first place. It appears that the Government have forgotten exactly wh public sector housing was introduced.

If Scotland was generally a high salaried, hig economic growth and prosperous economy, I could se some hope for the Government scheme working, but is no London or the south-east of England, and th Government are making sure that that position continue In reality, the rented sector is contracting in Scotland an council houses are being sold without replacement. N wonder waiting lists are growing, when the Government housing support grant policy and give-away discounts a ensuring that local authorities cannot cope with thes problems. Only when there is a policy of adequate ne building and replacement for sold council houses will loc authorities be able to fulfil their obligations properly.

We are seeing the inevitable consequence of th Government's vendetta against local authorities and w are seeing an all-time low in public sector house buildin Indeed, now it is more or less completely wiped out. Th Government's housing policy in Scotland uses idea suitable to yuppies in south-east England, but they a being applied to Scotland without thought of th consequences for our country and its people.

While I welcome as a small mercy the clauses which giv tenants further protection against harassment and illeg eviction, I cannot go along with the other parts of th rents package. I should like the Minister to state wheth it is true that under the Bill tenants with short assure tenancies will have no right to a rent book, to know th name and address of the landlord, to be informed of change of landlord, and not to have rent charged advance of the rental period, and that they will have n protection from false entries in their rent book, followin the determination of a rent by a rent assessme committee. Is that true? If so, it simply will not do. I a left wondering whether the Government have hired M Rachman as their adviser on the Bill. The Governme have deliberately chosen to favour landlord confidence the expense of tenant confidence.

The Bill, following as it does the promising objectiv stated in the White Paper, is a real disappointment. It fai to match up to the reality of Scottish housing needs, an it must be judged on that failure.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): I thank you, Mada Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity contribute to this debate. When the consultation paper c Scottish Homes was produced in the summer, I welcom it because it gave us an opportunity for a re-examinatio of the housing needs in Scotland, both public and privat as the latter has as many problems as the former.

There is undoubtedly a crisis in housing in Scotland an I shall give the House some statistics to consider. Son 150,000 people are on the housing waiting list, 20,0 people are homeless—their number has quadrupled the past four or five years — 250,000 people are overcrowded accommodation and 63,000 are in housing less than a tolerable standard. There are 850,000 houses the public sector, of which 120,000 need rewiring and mo than 300,000 are affected by dampness. Clearly, th problem is great.

Compare those facts with the figures for new bui houses. In 1979, about 8,500 new houses were built. Th figure decreased to 4,500 in 1985, representing a cut in ne build over eight years of approximately 50 per cent. In 1979, 36,000 houses were modernised, whereas in 1985, seven years later, 20,000 were modernised, representing a cut of more than 40 per cent.

We look expectantly at the Government's proposals in this Bill, but we look in vain. There is no mention of homelessness. It is a blot on the Scottish housing scene, yet there is not one mention of it in the Bill. We look for provisions on special housing needs, and my hon. friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) mentioned the Bield housing association, which deals with the needs of the elderly, but again there is no mention in the Bill of special housing needs.

As was mentioned earlier, a house condition survey was carried out in England and Northern Ireland to assess the housing position accurately. If the Government were sincere about putting out a consultation paper and introducing a housing Bill, first of all they should know what they are talking about, and they cannot possibly know what they are talking about when they have consistently refused to implement a housing condition survey in Scotland. That is the only way in which they can accurately assess the entire Scottish housing scene. The Government are proceeding on false premises, because they do not know the position. Indeed, do they care?

Experts estimate that about £4 billion is needed for modernisation and repairs. There is a lack of information in the Bill. There is no technical annex and there are no costings. It appears that the Government are not interested in the financial aspect. One is led to the conclusion that the Bill has more to do with the Tory preference for home ownership at the expense of the public sector than with the nub of the issue, which is the crisis in housing.

The Bill seeks to eliminate the general subsidies to public-sector housing, by the decrease of rate fund contribution and housing support grant. The only consequence of such a policy is a consequent massive increase in rents. Let us examine the Government's record of the past eight years on housing support grant as a proportion of the total local authority housing revenue account budget. Since 1980 it has fallen from 37 per cent. to a mere 7 per cent. in 1985, so money has not been forthcoming.

The Bill contains a number of platitudes about tenants' rights. The Under-Secretary of State was with me at a meeting in Glasgow during the summer, where a number of tenant representatives put their points of view about the consultation paper. At that meeting the Minister mentioned that tenants would not be pushed into any other scheme against their will. However, tenants have not been consulted. I would suggest that if one member, one vote is good for trade unions, one member, one vote is good for the tenants of SSHA. If we have democracy in one sphere, let us be consistent and exercise it into another sphere. There has been massive criticism from the tenants' movement, because the Government have been less than honest in their approach to housing, and less than fair in their approach to tenants.

A number of doubts have arisen because of the Bill. We talk about the SSHA and the Housing Corporation in Scotland coming together. The SSHA has 85,000 tenants and it is in debt. That is important. The Housing Association has 40,000 tenants. The combined total is 120,000 tenants, out of 850,000 public tenants in Scotland. We expect that body, with no experience of attracting private capital, to be capable of regenerating Scottish housing. It is a farce. That is the only way that one could describe it. It cannot regenerate Scottish housing without the resources, the experience and the grass roots knowledge that local authority housing departments have built up over many years.

When we consider the implications of the Bill for local authorities, we see that their role is being changed to what is called an enabling role. If they have an enabling role, will the Minister say that local authorities can be given the power to require private landlords to house the ever-increasing number of homeless people, because the situation of homeless people in Scotland is becoming desperately serious?

My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) spoke about MOD properties. In my constituency there are a number of MOD houses, and I have been in contact with the Minister about them. The families in those properties reflect the society in which they live. Families break up, couples divorce and people have to move out of the house. In my constituency, as soon as a family breaks up, the Ministry of Defence requires the wife to leave the house. She comes to my surgery or goes to the housing department in Dumbarton for rehousing. In this case, the local authority is acting, not as an enabler, but as a receptacle for those types of problems. That is an instance of how the MOD deals with such problems. It is not a benign way. How would private landlords deal with such a situation, and what would be expected of local authorities? Can we expect private landlords to behave any differently from the MOD? Such practice will lead to "sink" schemes for the homeless and for the low-paid.

In 1983 the Government allowed low-paid people up to £86 per week in wages. If their wages were below that, they would get assistance and housing benefit. That figure has been cut from £86 in 1983 to £68 in 1988. The Government are doing nothing for the low-paid. Homeless and low-paid people will become an increasing burden on local authorities, which will not have the resources to deal with it.

The issue of private finance appears in the Bill. It is quite simple. Local authorities are non-profit-making organisations. Private landlords are profit-making. For every £1 that will go to a private landlord, there will be £1 less for repairs, modernisation and investment.

The Secretary of State mentioned Quality Street. I would put it to him that, instead of referring to Quality Street, we should be talking about quality homes. The Quality Street type of experiment has been attempted in Scotland by no fewer than 18 local authorities during past years. They ran into opposition from the Scottish Office because the Treasury was not very pleased. The local authorities and the public sector have been keen during the past few years to get involved in joint ventures with the private sector, but they need the resources.

During the recess I had the opportunity to read a number of stories to my youngest child. One of them was "The Three Little Pigs" and that story comes to mind tonight.

Mr. Home Robertson: There are not three of them.

Mr. McFall: The wolf blew the first two houses down, but it could not blow the brick house down. However, the political wolves on the Government Benches are blowing the brick houses down in my constituency, and they are blowing them down in a more leisurely way than the wolf in the fairy tale did, because they are doing it by systematically and cynically denying funds for housing.

If the Minister can answer one crucial question satisfactorily, I shall join him in the Lobby tonight. What level of public investment will be maintained as a result of the Housing (Scotland) Bill? If he can answer that satisfactorily, he will have my vote. I doubt whether he will, because at no time has the consultation paper or the Bill demonstrated any consideration for the real housing needs of the people of Scotland.

8.57 pm

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): The right hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith) asked why the Bill is being opposed tonight. It is a pity that he did not stay to hear the answer. It offers home owners seeking repairs grants hindrance, not help. It removes essential and basic rights from private tenants, such as the right to succession, the right to a fair rent and the right to their tenancies. It brings despair to the homeless whose numbers have doubled in four years, and it heralds a new era of Rachmanism. Those are some of the reasons why the Bill must be rejected.

The Secretary of State referred to the House's concentration on public sector housing, but I wish to comment on the potentially drastic effect of this Bill on home owners. Part I of the Bill can remove all outstanding repairs and improvement grants from local authorities and hand them over lock, stock and barrel to an unelected body.

Under the Bill, private developers can become agents for administering grants. Speculators can take over and decide on priorities in the interests of profit, not people. There need be no votes on priority programmes, no competitive tendering and no rights for home owners in the queue for grants to seek intervention or support from elected councillors. Clearly part I is designed to prevent Labour councils such as Edinburgh from halting the flow of grant money to speculators and instead giving that money, as a priority, to individual home owners as it has done in the past. The misuse of scarce resources by a Conservative-controlled council has been alluded to by the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker).

Part I of the Bill does not come as a surprise to the home owners of Edinburgh and Glasgow. The Secretary of State has just announced a cut of £11·5 million in the repairs budget for home owners in Edinburgh and a cut of £17·5 million for those in Glasgow. He has cut grants and now he wants to cut corners. He wishes to remove the safeguards that have developed over decades and leave many people at the mercy of the sharp landlord who hides behind glossy advertising campaigns.

The Bill will have drastic consequences for the elderly, the young, families and carers. The elderly tenant who transfers to a new landlord and remains in her family-sized flat will be penalised if she vacates her large flat to allow a family access to it and takes a new tenancy. First, she will lose the protection of a fair rent, and her rent will automatically be set at a higher rate, despite the fact that she is giving up a family-sized flat for a smaller one. The Secretary of State implies that she would have a choice, but his Department's circular of 17 November 1987 removes any such choice. That Government circular on the housing benefit regulations will force her to pay an higher rent for her larger flat.

She does not, as the Secretary of State alleged, ha enjoy greater luxury than he thinks reasonable t affected. There is no mention of that in the Bill o circular. She does not, as the Secretary of State all have to enjoy greater luxury than he thinks reasonab be affected. There is no mention of that in the Bill o circular. She does not, again as the Secretary of Stat claimed, have to be grossly over-accommodated t affected. Neither the Bill nor the latest Depart circular use the words "luxury" or "grossly".

The Secretary of State should read his Departm circular of 17 November before misleading the H That circular says:

"the Government propose that the rent officer . . . sh also consider whether the claimant is over-accommodate will do this on the basis of a test of occupancy in relati the number of habitable rooms, which will be supplied t by the Secretary of State for Scotland.

If a claimant appears to be over-accommodated unde initial test, the rent officer will carry out a valuation, an establish whether the claimant is in fact over-accommo by reference to a more detailed test. If he concludes tha accommodation is unnecessarily large he will then asse equivalent market rent for a hypothetical dwelling"— not even a real dwelling—

"of the same type and in the same location which i unnecessarily large . . . The test of unnecessarily accommodation will be set as a maximum number of r of floorspace for particular family sizes."

The only gross thing about all this is the Secreta State's exaggeration about the future protection ava to the elderly. The only luxury is the luxury that the hon. and learned Gentleman affords himself in inve safeguards that he and the Government have no inte of enacting in the legislation.

There are no safeguards for the new tenant of a du landlord who becomes frail and whose son comes to after him. The Bill means that that son will have to up his home to look after his parent, but he will ha security of tenure, especially if the parent dies withi years. In that instance the right of succession will been removed. The Government will have enable tenant's landlord to throw the son out and to se property to the highest bidder. The Bill is an Government measure that will crucify the carer.

In case the new rents fixed do not bring high en returns to the private landlord, the Secretary of Stat taken the powers of arbitration from professional officers and given them to amateur appointees who their patronage to him. From bitter experience, pr tenants know that such rent assessment comm invariably set higher rents than those set by rent of under existing legislation. The Government are repl a system of gentlemen and players with a syste gentlemen and payers. If the rent assessment comm cannot find sufficient similar tenancies in the location, it appears that the Bill will sanction any le excessive rent, no matter how extortionate.

Therefore, it is hardly surprising that the body tha preside over all this will not be elected. Schedule I l the matter entirely to the Secretary of State. There w no representatives from tenants' groups or from resi associations, no place for local authority experts, no for community councils and no one elected from volu organisations that deal with housing. No doub

Secretary of State will follow his recent disgraceful precedent, illustrated by the health boards and the Scottish Development Agency, by appointing placemen. There will be too few exceptions to the rule—the appointees will be cost cutters, not consumers.

The new unelected body will be invested with horrendous powers. Part I of the Bill allows the Scottish Homes quango to purchase, compulsorily, land for developers, irrespective of the views of local people. Schedule 5 gives private landlords similar new powers over the lives of tenants—unprecedented since Rent Acts were first introduced in 1915.

Now the Government can let any landlord, no matter how disreputable, obtain possession and evict the tenant if he wants merely to refurbish the flats to sell them off. It is hardly surprising that the Bill has not merited support from any reputable quarter. Widespread opposition has come not just from tenants and tenants' organisations, but from the Scottish Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, Shelter, the Scottish Council for Single Homeless, the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations and Age Concern.

If the Government are so sure of their case, why did they publish their proposals for tenants' choice on 18 December, the week before Christmas, allowing only 17 working days, including Christmas eve, for tenants and others to respond? It is a shameful sham of a consultation and the latest in a disreputable list.

Why can the Government not heed the response of people to those housing proposals? Why are they deaf to the pleas of the public but ever willing to pander to the private sector? Why do they not admit that the Bill is the result of an election gimmick gone gaga, and withdraw it tonight?

9.6 pm

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): I suspect that there is agreement on both sides of the House on at least one point, which is that this is potentially one of the most radical Scottish housing measures ever to see the light of day, certainly ever to be debated in this Chamber. But that is as far as such agreement will go. The Opposition never could and never will agree to the many themes in the Bill which, far from extending tenants' choice as the Secretary of State for Scotland claimed, threaten the present rights of Scottish tenants. Far from beginning to tackle the acute housing crisis affecting Scotland today, they can serve only to make that crisis much worse.

As always, when we are dealing with specifically Scottish legislation, we know that whatever else the Government might have drawn inspiration from in introducing the Bill, they certainly did not draw it from the people of Scotland. The people have already made known what they think about the Government and their policies —they made it clear on 11 June, when three out of every four Scottish voters gave an emphatic no to the vision of Scotland that Conservative Members are attempting to fashion with legislation such as this.

We do not have to rely only on the evidence of last June to know that Scotland does not want this Bill. We have much more recent and specific evidence, which relates directly to the Bill. I am referring to the consultation process over the Scottish Homes proposals, during which the SSHA tenants overwhelmingly rejected the Government's ideas and formed themselves into a national federation of tenants specifically to fight the Scottish Homes plan. Many of my hon. Friends spoke at public meetings during that consultation process, as I did in Dundee. They will know the strength of feeling among tenants who oppose the Scottish Homes plan. The Government must answer the question: where is the moral justification for imposing the Scottish Homes proposals on tenants who do not want them? Where is the democratic justification for that?

The Government should know that the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations has argued that the future of the SSHA should be determined separately from the Scottish Homes proposals, and in full consultation with the 80,000 tenants of the SSHA. So why are the Government not prepared to give those tenants a ballot so that they can show whether they oppose or approve of the measures in the Bill?

We heard an awful lot about ballots from Conservative Members during the miners' strike. They were all in favour of ballots then. They always are in favour of ballots when they think that it suits their purpose. But in this instance, when they believe that a ballot will not suit their purpose, we do not hear about ballots at all. The SSHA tenants are to be denied the ballot that they deserve.

The tenants have already asked for such a ballot. It was refused by the SSHA itself. The chairman of the SSHA is Mr. Derek Mason, who is in the short leet for the position of chairman of Scottish Homes. I hope that he is more successful than some of the other candidates on that short leet. In this month's edition of "Labour Research", he is quoted as saying about the SSHA's tenants' demand for a ballot:

> "I do not see the point of a ballot when we know the result. We know virtually every tenant is against the proposals."

That is what the chairman of the SSHA says. He asks why there should be a ballot when we know that the answer is no to Scottish Homes.

But the Government, by bringing forward the Bill, are saying that they do not care what the tenants think or might say. Neither do they care what Scotland thinks or might say. They will give Scotland the Bill anyway and ram Scottish Homes down its people's throats. That is a dangerous road for any Government, especially one with so few Scottish Members, to embark upon. I urge them to think again.

I turn to the detail of the Bill and the issue of tenants' rights. For a long time, the Government have masqueraded as promoters of tenants' rights. What will the Bill do for the rights of tenants, particularly under the new arrangements for assured tenancies and short-term assured tenancies? It is important to take into consideration the Government's whole housing policy in this respect, and not only the legislation before us. We know, for example, that since 1979 the Government have been squeezing the money available to district councils to finance their housing revenue accounts. We know that housing support grant has been slashed. Dundee district council, for instance, used to receive more than £8 million a year in housing support grant from central Government; today, it receives nothing.

At the same time, the rate fund contributions to the housing revenue account have been dramatically pegged back. Dundee district council, which at one time could contribute more than £4 million from the rates to the housing revenue account, is now restricted to contributing less than £500,000 to it. The measures to be imposed by the Government must have an effect on housing revenue accounts of district councils and on their ability to manage and maintain their stock.

Inevitably, rents have been forced up to much higher levels than they would have been had the Government maintained their financial support for council housing. Equally inevitably, the councils have found it increasingly difficult—indeed, well nigh impossible—to meet their responsibilities as landlords in the way in which they would have wanted, and would have done, if the Government had continued to support council housing financially.

The process of Government cuts was important in softening up the public sector housing and making it vulnerable to the sort of privatisation threat that the Bill now makes possible. Any hon. Member who has public sector rented housing in his constituency will know what damage has been done by Government cuts, and will know the frustration experienced by council tenants who can have emergency repairs done only towards the tail end of the year because their local office's maintenance budget runs out at the end of December, instead of the end of March as it should do. Hon. Members will know of the anger among council tenants whose aged metal-framed windows cannot be replaced in the current year, or in any of the years of the council's five-year plan, because there is such a backlog of houses requiring window replacement that it will take the council decades to work through it with the level of finance that is now available.

That is the context in which the measures contained in the Bill must be assessed. Pick-your-landlord might sound a fine idea, but what will happen? First, it will mean choice in one direction only, as several hon. Members have said—from the public into the private or independent rented sector. I know of thousands of tenants in Dundee who might want to pick their local district council as a landlord in preference to the present owners of the houses, but that choice has been denied them by the Government.

Even tenants who can pick their landlords and have the right to choose are in a much less straightforward position than would at first appear from the Bill. We know that private landlords across Scotland are, at this very moment, eyeing council housing stock; they have designs on it and it is not hard to see that they find only certain types of housing stock desirable—the sort that is basically sound and desirable and located in a good neighbourhood but which requires improvements of one kind or another which the council cannot afford to finance.

Those are the houses that interest the private sector landlords and they will make the tenants of such houses the kind of offer which many of them will find it difficult to refuse. A new kitchen or a bathroom or a complete new set of double glazed windows or whatever else the council cannot afford to put in will be offered by the private sector landlord. The tenants will be tempted and will opt to change ownership to a private landlord on the basis of the offer made to them by that landlord.

The improvements are what the tenant will get from the deal struck with the private landlord. However, every deal has two sides to it and the tenant will lose in other directions. First, there will be higher rents because under the new tenancies rents are to be at market level or are to be freely negotiated between the landlord and the tenant. We all know that market level or freely negot are shorthand for putting up the rents to a excess of current council house rents in Scotla

There will also be a loss of the rights that te public sector now enjoy. For example, as soon picks his landlord that is it. He does not get to p landlord and even if the landlord turns out to Rachman the tenant is stuck with him for the life. It is like a bee sting because under this le is a right that can be used only once and then has had it. The tenant will also lose the right to b house because that right extends only to pu tenants.

These tenants' rights about which the Tori either of fundamental importance or they are is no basis for saying that tenants in the public have these rights while tenants in the private se denied them. The rights should be available to and to all tenants, but that fundamental princi breached by the Bill.

There is also the loss of security of tenure from choosing a private sector landlord. The landlords repossessing assured tenancies are se schedules to the Bill. They include the tenant delaying the payment of rent which has beco due. Hon. Members should notice that it is n refusing to pay or of failure to pay, but merely delay in paying rent. Whoever drafted this Bi never knew what it was to be poor and experienced the regular scramble to try to scra the money to pay, the rent man. If a tenant do the money to pay, he will persistently find hi making payments.

Under this Bill it is the poor who will be th their houses by the private sector landlord. Th about delay in paying rent is nothing less tha for dispossessing the poor, and it should have a civilised society. However, Scotland has bec less civilised society in the last eight years sinc placed under a Government whom the Scottis not elect. It is not just the poor who will ha because if a landlord needs the house to pay it will not matter if the tenant has been a model he will go and it is just tough luck.

The Bill will mean higher rents, fewer rig security of tenure; that appears to be the Government's approach in trying to tackle housing crisis. It is a terrible indictm Government that after eight years this is the legislation that they can bring forward to Scotland's housing problems. The Bill will n problems. It will make them worse for the pe guilty of doing that.

9.18 pm

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Loth grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for D (Mr. McAllion) and to all my hon. Friend spoken in the debate for bringing to it an a because there is a housing crisis in Scotland, Friend the Member for Dundee, East ha appreciate that the Scottish Office does not aware of that state of affairs, but that is the crisis has been severely aggravated in recent financial and legislative interference of the G They do not want to know about that.

Less than a month before they published the Bill, the Government issued a parody of a White Paper which is more a catalogue of ministerial prejudice than an analysis of the Scottish housing scene. The essence of Tory thinking in Scotland seems to be that there is something fundamentally reprehensible about being a tenant. The Tories believe that public sector tenancies are an evil which must be stamped out of the Scottish body politic. That shows that the Government are out of touch with the people of Scotland, not least because more than 58 per cent. of Scottish households are tenants, mostly in the public sector. Perhaps that accounts for the fact that the Government have precious little support in Scotland.

The Government have gone to great lengths to force district and islands councils to dispose of houses and encourage tenants to buy, whether or not they can afford the costs of owner-occupation. Labour Members are happy for people who have acquired their houses, but I wish that the Government would understand that for a significant number of people it is best to remain tenants. Surely they have rights, too. When will the Government grasp that fact? These policies have contributed to a brand new crisis of owner-occupation in Scotland, with record numbers of mortgage defaults adding to an already disastrous crisis of homelessness.

The Labour party supports home ownership, and always has done, through means such as tax incentives, for example. However, it is wrong to promote owner-occupation at the expense of homeless people in Scotland. There has been a net loss of 46,000 council houses available to let since the Government came to power in 1979. The position will be further aggravated when the Minister removes the cost floor on council house sales, as he has threatened today.

Homelessness is a national scandal in Scotland. It is a personal tragedy for far too many of our fellow citizens. Twice as many cases of homelessness occur now as did four years ago. Last year, about 31,000 families and individuals found themselves seeking accommodation under the homeless persons legislation. What did the Government say about that? As my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) said, there is not a word about homelessness in the Bill, although there was a brief paragraph in the White Paper, which I shall quote:

"The problem of homelessness also needs to be set in the context of the Government's plans. Homelessness is a symptom of failures in the housing system."

How about that for an understatement?

"The Government's proposals will make the housing system work better. It is important to address the problem in this way rather than through stopgap measures, specific to the homeless, which do not solve the underlying problem. The homeless will benefit from wider choice and a share in the general improvement of the supply and quality of housing as much as other sectors of the population."

The Government are not interested in taking any specific action to deal with this immediate and urgent crisis which afflicts so many of our citizens. It is an indication of the Government's appalling complacency.

In addition to homelessness, there are also the serious problems of overcrowding, bad housing conditions and dampness. A quarter of people in Scotland live in overcrowded homes. COSLA has estimated that no fewer than 250,000 houses need remedial treatment for dampness or condensation. It is difficult to get a clear picture of the need for repairs, because the Govern steadfastly refuse to conduct a house condition surv Scotland, as there is in England and Wales.

The Under-Secretary of State was a member o Select Committee on Scottish Affairs which investi the problem of dampness in housing some time ago. be interesting to see whether we shall have another Committee on Scottish Affairs. Perhaps we shall more about that on Wednesday. If the Under-Secret State were honest, he would have to acknowledge th Bill and the rest of the Government's policies aggravating Scotland's housing crisis.

One of the problems in Scotland today is that w governed by a tiny clique who know and care little their subjects. In political terms, the Government precious little to lose in Scotland. The fact that the Sc Conservative party has so few elected Members at lo national level—only 10 Members of Parliament—n that it is probably not aware of what the peop Scotland are talking about. Scottish Conserv Members are not speaking to them. They are speakin to tenants, but to merchant bankers and estate a Legislation such as this shows that those are the peo whom they are talking.

If Scottish Conservative Members met and co ponded with some of the 202,000 people who are stu waiting lists for rented houses, they might understan bitter anger and frustration of those who are being d the basic human right to live in a home of their own area in which they want to live. How on earth a party forces thousands of young families to live in overcro and insecure accommodation can still try to pose a party of the family really beggars belief. The Bill will things worse.

We know that the Secretary of State for Scotla beyond redemption. He is not about to start compro ing with public opinion in Scotland at this stage career. Indeed, he frequently brings to mind B famous words about politicians being bought and sol English gold.

The Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Dou Hamilton) has a reputation as a basically fair-minde compassionate man. I hope that we shall see manifestations of such qualities in the Comm Corridor.

When the idea of a Scottish Development Agency would include the Scottish part of the Ho Corporation was first suggested, we stated suppor such an initiative to help elected local councils to deal the growing housing crisis in Scotland. But what has emerged is quite different. It has emerged that Government intend to set up a monstrous new nati housing quango that will effectively supersede councils and will have a duty to revive the ugliest as of private landlordism in Scotland.

The worst fears that we have heard expressed have confirmed in today's issue of The Scotsman, no less. T is speculation about the appointment of no less a pe than the Earl of Ancram as chairman of the Sco Homes organisation. We know that the Secretary of S himself is personally to nominate nine members. The no undertaking that there will be a representativ tenants. We see some interesting jockeying for chairman's position.

[Mr. John Home Robertson]

Of course, there are precedents for such people being appointed. When Hamish Gray was dismissed by the people of Ross, Cromarty and Skye, he found himself promoted to Minister of State. Alex Fletcher, who was dismissed by the people of Edinburgh, Central, found himself appointed to the Scottish Development Agency. There must be some concern that the Earl of Ancram, who was dismissed by the people of Edinburgh, South, could end up as chairman of this outfit. I hope that the Minister can assure us that that will not happen. The people of Scotland presently face the severest provocation from an alien minority Administration. Frankly, some of us have already had enough of it.

Part II of the Bill will establish a whole new framework of landlord and tenant legislation. Frankly, that has more to do with encouraging private landlords than with protecting tenants. Indeed, that is the whole thrust of the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) rightly cited many examples of the erosion of tenants' rights. No doubt he will have opportunities to go into greater detail in Committee.

The term "assured tenancy" has a nice cosy ring about it. It is clear enough that we are talking about a variation on the theme of "Catch-22". Tenants will have two choices. They will have limited security but precious little rent control, or they will have limited rent control and precious little security. As we know, even the phasing limits on rent increases will be withdrawn by the Government. It appears that the Government are seeking to build on the spectacular failure of the private rented sector in recent years.

It is worth mentioning that most of the 130,000 empty houses in Scotland today are privately owned. That is a standing indictment of those owners who are prepared neither to let nor to sell such properties, but prefer to let them stand empty and rot. There is nothing to stop people letting houses at fair rents at present. Perhaps I should have declared an interest as a private landlord. There is nothing to stop people letting houses. It seems to be unnecessary for the Government to give such generous incentives to private landlords. They seem to be building on failure. There seems to be no ground for the hope that they will be able to provide the additional rented homes that we all know are required in Scotland.

Private landlords' share of housing in Scotland has collapsed to only 6·3 per cent. of the total amount. That includes some of the worst housing in Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind indicated assent.

Mr. Home Robertson: The Secretary of State is smiling. Even under his stewardship, that decline has continued. What grounds are there for expecting this to succeed, even with those incentives? Is it worth making the sacrifices that the Secretary of State is asking tenants to make? The Government are running an awful risk of reviving the evils of Rachmanism in their endeavours to revive the private rented sector. There is nothing wrong with private renting, provided it is subject to reasonable protection and controls. Perhaps I should give notice that, if any speculator decides to take unreasonable advantage of the provisions in the legislation, it is likely that a Labour-controlled Scottish assembly will take retrospective action in the very near future to restore such controls.

We cannot understand why the Governm obsessed with their doctrinaire campaign a authority housing. Local authorities could an allowed to continue to meet the need for ren in Scotland. As the Secretary of State rather acknowledged, they have given the lead in housing tenure, encouraging private develo promoting co-operatives.

The Glasgow district council has been setti in promoting housing associations. We need from the Tory Administration in that res authorities have been backing housing associ Government are proposing radical changes in housing association tenancies which could te out of housing associations in Scotland. It is offensive to the principles of voluntar associations that they should be forced to ja rents and undermine the security of future te proposed in the Bill.

I join other hon. Members in paying tribu tenants for the powerful opposition that demonstrated to the Scottish Homes propos already suffering from Government rent polic have made it clear that they are not prepared off to private sector landlords, accordi Government's original proposals. The Secret wriggled a lot on this subject in the course o but he knows as well as everybody else that clear indication in the original proposal Government intended to hive off SSHA hou thankful for small mercies. That has now beer by the Government.

The reference in the Bil is bogus. I fear that this could be another mar the dirty tricks which we have become ac enduring from the Scottish Office in recent ye and disgraceful that today the Scottish representative of the Government in Scotland being the representative of Scotland in the as it rightly ought to be. The Bill is an ugly exa

The Government are prepared to accept t value of tax relief on privately owned hous average of £680 per house per year. It is worth that 41 per cent. of all mortgage interest concentrated in London and south-east Eng same time, the average public subsidy for a c in Scotland has fallen to £55·74, compared with £680 for private houses in England. The hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) asked whether we are against public subsidies for the private sector. When the Labour Government were in power, there was, broadly speaking, parity of subsidy for houses in both the public and private sectors. What a change there has been since this lot came to power. The interests of Scottish tenants have been sacrificed shamefully by the Government, and the Bill is intended to make matters worse. It is deliberately designed to force rents up to encourage private investment in rented houses.

One wonders how many rented houses will be achieved as a result of the Bill. On Friday 27 November I asked the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West how many additional private sector rented dwellings he expected to achieve as a result of the recent proposals in the White Paper on housing. On that day he said that he would reply to my question as soon as possible. We waited with bated breath while computers whirred in the Scottish Office to find how many extra houses would be achieved by the legislation. A definitive reply came on the Monday: "A considerable number." The Government have not got a clue as to how many houses the legislation is likely to achieve.

We know that many tenants cannot afford an increase in rent and have much to fear from the abolition of fair rents. But the Government seek to shrug that off by saying that there is no need to worry because the tenants will be protected by housing benefit. Of course, we know that they will not be, because of provisions debated earlier.

The Bill will centralise bureaucratic control over housing in Scotland. It will undermine the position of tenants. It will do absolutely nothing to provide for the needs of thousands of Scots who are homeless or who live in overcrowded, damp, sub-standard accommodation. This is the sort of insensitive, bad legislation which brings the Government of the United Kingdom into disrepute and could undermine the unity of the kingdom. Ministers who disobey the electorate should be aware of the sort of reaction that they are likely to provoke. I urge the House to reject the motion for a Second Reading of the Bill and to support our reasoned amendment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I should say at the beginning that I have an interest in a company which could be affected by the terms of the Bill, but would say to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), as regards his question about clause 67(5), that I wrote to him on Friday: there is nothing sinister about that clause and it will be considered in Committee.

This has been a useful and wide-ranging debate. It has provided an opportunity to demonstrate——

Mr. Harry Ewing: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am astonished to hear the Minister say that he has an interest in a company. Is it not the usual procedure that when Members of Parliament become Ministers of the Crown they dispose of any interests that they may have in any company? It is unprecedented to hear a Minister begin his ministerial speech by saying that he has an interest in a company which might benefit from the legislation that he is introducing.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am certainly not a director or anything like that. It may be only a contingent interest. If the hon. Member wants to look it up Register of Members' Interests, he will see it. I wen the people in charge of the Register today; they w certain that it was a declarable interest, but, just in is, I am following the example of the hon. Member f Lothian who, I suspect, has a greater interest than

The Bill is intended to do three things: first, to p choice for tenants in housing, as and when they w secondly, to provide diversity of provision, princip the revival of the private rented sector; thirdly, to a new housing development agency in Scotland to the best use of resources. I draw the attention of the to a significant statement made in the debate Queen's Speech on Scotland on 29 June last year right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, Ea Smith):

"I think I speak for the vast majority of peop certainly for the Opposition when I say that we expenditure in our constituencies. We do not care too whether it is public or private, and it will be better if we can get an intelligent combination of both public expenditure leading in private sector expenditu [Official Report, 29 June 1987; Vol. 118, c. 340.]

The provisions of the Bill are, in large part, inten enable the sort of partnership which the right ho learned Gentleman was seeking. Assured tenanci remove one of the main barriers to private investment in rented housing, which will be welcomed. Scottish Homes, as a wide-ranging en and funding body, will work towards fin arrangements for housing with co-operation be private and public sector sources. Instead of everything itself, it will create the right climate in those seeking a home and those intending to provi can work together.

The hon. Members for Roxburgh and Berwic (Mr. Kirkwood), for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) a Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) asked about a national condition survey. COSLA believes that such a su required, and we are keeping the possibility under r The hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Gri asked about the cuts in non-HRA allocatio Edinburgh and Glasgow. In 1987-88, the figures inc £58 million earmarked for the backlog of repai improvement grants—£32 million for Glasgow an million for Edinburgh. The provisional figures for 19 include a reduced figure for each authority for this pu of £14·5 million, recognising that the bulk of the b has been cleared.

Since 1979, it has increased by about 14 pe I accept what the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garsc (Mr. Dewar) said about housing support grant reduced, but housing benefit expenditure has incr beyond all measure. Since 1978, it has increased mor 15 times, or by more than 1,500 per cent. parliamentary reply to the hon. Member for Clyd (Mr. Hood) on 18 December, I said that in 19 housing benefit in Scotland was £42 million. For 19 the figure was £664 million, which on any view immense sum.

Mr. Dewar: Does the Minister agree that the Government have forced up rents by a remarkably large amount?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman's point is correct. We want more money to be spent on management and maintenance, and the Grieve report on Glasgow, which was commissioned by Glasgow district council, stressed the necessary relationship between appropriate rent levels and housing management and maintenance. That report contained many relevant points.

The hon. Members for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) and for Dumbarton questioned whether Scottish Homes is an appropriate body to deal with Scotland's pressing housing problems. The hon. Member for Garscadden queried the powers that it will be given. Appointments to the board will be made entirely on merit. We are examining ways in which the views of tenants may be communicated to the board. That may involve a tenants' representative, but there is no need to prescribe it in statute. If we did that, and it was too narrowly defined, it might exclude some of the best candidates.

The Housing Corporation has no powers to carry out environmental improvements. It wants such powers, and the Bill provides them. Unifying the expertise of the Housing Corporation and the SSHA will extend the benefits of that expertise to more people than SSHA tenants. The idea that SSHA tenants' choice will be restricted is also a fiction. That was touched on by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart). Scottish Special Housing Association tenants will have the same houses managed by the same staff, and the same rights.

Mr. Lambie: My district council is to conduct a referendum among SSHA tenants to establish their desire for a new landlord. If tenants in Irvine in my constituency decide that they want to opt for the district council as their landlord, will the Government accept that, or will they renege on their promises to SSHA tenants?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Tenants' wishes will, of course, be respected. The hon. Gentleman should remember that the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Act 1980, which the Labour party opposed, established the very rights which the tenants wish to be preserved and which will most certainly be preserved.

Mr. Lambie: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Let me finish my point. In the Tenants' Rights Etc. (Scotland) Act, introduced by my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State, we brought in security of tenure—a right that I do not believe any political party will take away, even though the Labour party opposed the Bill at the time.

The White Paper confirmed earlier assurances that rents——

Mr. Lambie: The hon. Gentleman made an important statement. He said that tenants' wishes will be respected. If SSHA tenants in my constituency decide that they wish Cunninghame district council to be their landlord, will their wishes be respected?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I must make it clear to the hon. Gentleman that the right that we are giving tenants is an individual right that cannot be taken away. For example, if a referendum had been conducted in a certain town at the time of the Tenants' Rights, Etc. (Scotland) Bill, to ascertain whether people thought that tenants should have the right to purchase t majority might have said no, but 106,00 purchased their homes. The rights given in be honoured and tenants' wishes respected is passed, if a tenant wishes to transfer, hi should be respected.

Mr. Lambie: To the district council?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The h asks whether tenants should be able to tra public sector body to another. There is n access to the public sector; the problem is round. We are principally discussing housi The new element, in the form of Scottish H that more choice is offered to tenants.

The third reason for supporting the crea Homes is that a one-door approach for the actively involved, including local authoriti sector agencies, tenants and the private sec to avoid potential confusion about where can cause difficulties for those tryi partnerships. For that reason, the plans f Housing Development Agency will largely successes of the Scottish Development amendment describes Scottish Homes as able quango" but the body is being establi the same basis as the SDA, which the supported. The Scottish Development Ag throughout Britain because nowhere else in powers enjoyed by the SDA brought toge body.

My hon. Friend the Member for Taysi Walker) and my right hon. Friend th Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan- clear that they support the Bill and said tha integrated approach. That was one of the GEAR project: we need co-ordination amo agencies. Scottish Homes will be a strongly with the capacity to ensure precisely such c being a funder and provider of houses, promoter and, above all, a partner. Scott continue with the process, but on a greate considerably more speed than before. L will be assisted in their role of assessing hou strategy planning.

The extremely important subject of ho raised by the hon. Members for Berwickshire, for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. for Angus, East. The problem has many c into perspective, I should point out that th than 130,000 more houses than household more than half of them in the private sect must avoid mismatches, while bringing possible of those homes back into circul answer for Scotland as a whole must be reasons which make people afraid to let h empty for a while but which they will need to reform the private sector will achieve diminishing the rights of existing tenants.

The Government are committed to effective legislative framework to help th are doing a number of things to achieve have increased resources for capital inves authorities, particularly for special needs. S and guidance has been issued to local autho standards and priority allocation policies. Thirdly, we have funded a number of initiatives such as the Shelter rural housing project to find homes for the homeless. Fourthly, steps have been taken to increase the availability of accommodation for rent through the housing association movement. Fifthly, our proposals to reform the private rented sector will increase the willingness of landlords to make property available for rent.

The hon. Member for Pollok suggested that the Government's proposals were a charter for rogue landlords and Rachmanism, but that is untrue, for a number of reasons. First, the proposals strengthen protection for all tenants against harassment and illegal eviction. Secondly, tenants will have security of tenure very similar to that under existing legislation, and safeguards are built in to prevent the charging of excessive rents and avoid Rachmanism. Rents will be freely negotiable between landlord and tenant, but tenants need not accept excessive rents.

There will be safeguards. First, a tenant with an assured tenancy will be able to obtain a determination of rent from the rent assessment committee if at the end of his initial tenancy agreement the landlord proposes a new rent which the tenant does not accept. If the landlord wishes to increase the rent, he must follow the set procedures which give the tenant the right of appeal to the rent assessment committee for arbitration. Secondly, a tenant with a short assured tenancy will be able to apply to the rent assessment committee during the tenancy for determination of a reasonable market rent if he thinks that the rent is excessive.

Thirdly, all rents for assured or short assured tenancies for which housing benefit is payable will have to be referred to the rent officer, who will assess the proper market rent for the premises and the appropriateness of the accommodation. If he finds the rent to be excessive or the tenants to be over-accommodated, housing benefit subsidy will be limited. That will help to ensure that excessive rents are not charged. Fourthly, the strengthened position of tenants against harassment and illegal eviction and the new right to compensation for illegal eviction will prevent landlords from charging excessive rents.

Under the new system, all tenants will have security of tenure, except that those on short assured tenancies will have security of tenancy only for the specified period of the lease. Arbitrary repossession will certainly not be allowed. The landlord will need to show that he is acting within the law.

Mr. Wilson: The Minister has twice referred to safeguards against harassment. Will he comment on the conclusion by the citizens advice bureaux that the incentives to harass will be so much greater than at present that they will outweigh any possible defences written into the Bill?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: That is precisely why we are bringing in stronger measures against harassment. We can discuss this in Committee, but we believe that the measures are strong enough to achieve the purposes that the hon. Gentleman wishes.

A tenant with an assured tenancy has security of tenure unless the landlord can gain possession of the house on one of the limited grounds specified. That gives the tenant confidence that he or she can plan to reside in the house for as long as he or she wishes.

The hon. Member for Garscadden mention landlord can apply for repossession if the tenan than three months in arrears and that there is no for the courts. That is factually correct, but t must be more than three months in arrears both a of the service of the notice and at the date of hearing. That almost certainly means that the large and long-standing arrears.

The hon. Member for Angus, East asked w tenant would have the right to know the landlor Automatically, if the tenant signs a lease agre must know with whom he has made the agree who has signed it. That applies whether the lan person or a company.

There is no doubt that the proposal relating t and short tenancies will bring back into use a larg of houses for rent. We believe that that can only good.

With regard to housing associations, this record amount of £132·74 million is being given t them. The Government have more than tr resources for the movement since 1978-79. In th years, over £700 million has been made availa movement, and that will certainly be continued. that Scottish Homes will accelerate that prog housing association tenants will be subject t tenancies.

In that connection, the consultation docume proposed new financial regime for housing as makes it clear that public subsidy towards the c of new development will be based on rent level reasonable in proportion to the household inco average prospective tenant. I emphasise that associations will be expected to charge reason affordable rents. It will be for new tenants to a ability to pay the appropriate rent and to take int any assistance available to them from housin bearing in mind that their rents will be determin housing association themselves.

I take issue with the hon. Member for Pol talked about par-value co-ops and said that th council got round the Secretary of State's obstr fact, the Southdeen co-operative and the othe operatives in Glasgow were approved by the Se State. His approval is necessary and is given to th by the authority to the tenants of the houses c after careful consideration has been given to th arrangements. It is important that a success is each co-operative as it comes into existence. HAG regime will certainly be a flexible system considerable emphasis will be placed on disc individual projects between Scottish Homes housing associations concerned.

Opposition Members have failed to pr alternative prescription to our proposals. I sugge heart they know the Bill that we offer is a moderate and beneficial way forward. Indeed, Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) right to say that Opposition Members were stru find reasons to oppose the Bill. A few years Labour party opposed the Tenants' Rig (Scotland) Act 1980. Indeed, I recall a whole Committee when we fought for the rights of cou tenants to be established on the statute book. T a logical development of the proposals in that A policies have been highly successful and more than 106,000 tenants have purchased their homes. Choice, diversity and responsibility will be equally successful now.

I am proud that a Conservative Minister for Housing, Walter Elliot, created the Scottish Special Housing Association, which has greatly improved Scotland's housing stock. I believe that we are continuing the work that he started many years ago as a Glasgow Member. With the combined expertise of the SSHA and the Housing Corporation we can continue that improvement but at a much greater speed than ever before. The Bill will improve the quality of housing in Scotland and we have an inescapable duty.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Poland

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

10.31 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I am most grateful for my great good fortune in earning the opportunity to initiate a debate on the United Kingdom's relations with Poland. I am pleased to see a number of other right hon. and hon. Members in their places, including the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) and the right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine).

The people of the United Kingdom, not just those of us who have Polish blood in our veins, and successive United Kingdom Governments have a much greater interest in and understanding of Poland than most other countries. This is reflected in the welcome demand, which we have heard recently, of the Prime Minister to meet Mr. Lech Walesa. We are concerned to give more economic support to Poland and to develop further our cultural and trade relations with that country, but at the moment I perceive little meaningful change as yet sufficient to give us the confidence to do so. Perestroika is being attempted, but as yet with little evidence of real glasnost.

Our concern is perhaps best illustrated by reference to some specific cases which, I am afraid, show how devious the Polish authorities can be at times. Nowadays, as the Polish Government claim, they do not imprison people for what are, on the face of them, political offences; but unfortunately the Polish Government still imprison people for their political views and accuse people of false crimes because of those views. It is worth recalling that that is nothing new.

Father Popieluszko was accused of keeping an arsenal of weapons, including dynamite, at his vicarage. It was alleged that all the weaponry was found during an official police search, yet, when vigorous public protest was made against this grotesque fabrication of evidence, the proceedings against the father were dropped. Sadly, of course, he was murdered instead. His murderers, all commissioned officers of the security police, have now been granted an amnesty and they can look forward to an early release — an early release which would not be countenanced for murderers in this country.

Compare that with the fate of Captain Adam Hodysz, whose only crime was to assist Solidarity. He is serving his six years' sentence in full in Barczewo, one of the harshest, if not the harshest, of Polish prisons. The Polish Government must be told how dimly we view the mercy —the scandalous mercy—shown to Father Popieluszko's murderers.

Polish Government policy, of course, maks it difficult for Her Majesty's Government to invervene. They cannot, one understands, intervene in cases involving what would have been criminal charges in the West—which brings me to the cases of Kornel Morawiecki and Jan Andrzej Gorny. Those are clear enough cases. Both men face trumped-up charges of a non-political nature; but let us look at the reality. Both are outstanding leaders of the underground in Poland. The Communist authorities hunted them desperately from the imposition of martial law on 13 December 1981 for nearly six years. But why? They do no more than lead peaceful protest against the Government. They are actually the voice of legitimate, though illegal, opposition.

Mr. Gorny is a member of the national executiv committee of Solidarnosc and the leader of underground Solidarity in Silesia. At the moment, he is supposedl accused of non-payment of maintenance to his wife, yet strangely, on the basis of that civil charge he has been hel incommunicado and denied access to his lawyers since 1 November 1987. This does not sound to me like th treatment normally afforded to a person on a mino criminal charge, let alone a minor civil charge. In reality this is just the sort of case in which I would hope th Minister would be making strong and specific representa tions to the Polish Government, and not allowing th cloud of an apparently normal judicial charge to deceiv him.

As regards Mr. Morawiecki, the situation is simila Since 1982 he has been the leader of the Solidarity Defian organisation, which has developed a network of branche throughout Poland and which resolutely opposes th regime's claim of sole rights to govern Poland on the basi of its diktat. There is no record of a single terrorist ac committed by his organisation nor of a single attempt o life or damage to any property by it, yet warrants for M Morawiecki's arrest were out for six years. He is no charged with terrorism, on the basis of the allege interception of listening devices, but that charg materialised only after his arrest on 9 November 1987. is another case, in truth, of a political prisoner bein arrested for his beliefs.

Now we come to what I believe to be the worst of thes cases, the case of a woman who was arrested with M Morawiecki, Hanna Lukowska-Karniej, mother of thre children. I would like to quote at some length from a open letter sent by her daughter, Zofia, to Professo Bartoszewski, a respected Polish humanitarian, honoure for his outstanding efforts to save Jewish lives during th Nazi occupation of Poland. In the letter, Zofia says:

"My mother will not reply to your letter for the time bein as she is at present in jail accused of having misappropriate the identity document of another person . . . A month aft the publication of the warrant for my mother's arrest, in Jun 1984, she was arrested and charged with participation in th leadership of the Solidarity Defiant organisation. Luckily, i July of that year there was an amnesty and my mother wa released. The amnesty however did not terminate the trail c chicanery, invigilation and close surveillance of my mothe In July 1985, after a brutal house search, involving th breaking down of our front door, she was forced to shy awa from her own home. Simply speaking, she was driven awa from it by the harassment of the Security Service. The burde of harassment then fell upon me and my siblings. I was the 17 years old, my brother Edward 15 and the youngest siste 8.

From July 1985 to date we suffered about 10 hou searches, more often than not without any adult present. W have been watched, bugged and followed. On many occasion I have been taken from school for interrogations or hou searches. Recently, I was taken for a night-time interrogatio and only after the intervention of the Wroclaw Bishop's offi I was released at midnight. There were periods where I wa followed non-stop, step by step. A particular example of th barbarity was the setting up of this form of surveillance on m little sister aged eight, resulting in her nervous break-dow She was afraid to leave the house and cried continuously. was forced to smuggle her out of the house and hide her a friend's. She now stays with her maternal grandmother, wh is 83 years old, almost totally blind and herself in need of ca and attention . . . On 9 November my mother was arreste together with the leader of Solidarity Defiant. Regardless o the triviality of the charge levelled at her, which I mentio above, she was taken away to the Central Investigative Ja in Warsaw (more than 200 miles from her home) where sh remains. I have not been able to obtain a permit to visit h for the past month . . . My siblings and I find it very hard being without our mother and I ask you to help releasing her . . . Surely"— says this young girl—

"we have the right to live here as human beings without fear and grief to accompany the consecutive generations of this unhappy land."

That is a letter written not years or even months ago. That letter was written by a 17-year-old girl in Wroclaw on 8 December 1987, days ago.

I believe and hope that the Minister and right hon. and hon. Members will agree that the arrest of those individuals is a scandal. Of course, we must consider it in an historical context. Poland is not a Soviet country by her people's choice. Whatever justification was presented to the Polish people at the time of Yalta and Potsdam, it must now be accepted that the Soviet-dominated Government imposed on the Polish people have not been accepted by the population, and never will be. The imposition of martial law on 13 December 1981 is grim proof positive that Poland is ruled by the Soviets against the people's will. Day by day, we see evidence of rejection, most recently in the referendum, which showed that although the Polish people are prepared for change, as they have demonstrated by their actions, matters will really change only when their consent has been obtained.

Of course, there is a basis for hope. Glasnost, when it percolates through to Warsaw, holds prospects of a liberalisation of Poland which would create the conditions for perestroika by consent. All those developments will be welcomed by everyone concerned — and we are all concerned with those issues. But it is pointed out to us again and again by people who have first-hand knowledge of the workings of the Communist system that, so far, the changes made are no more than superficial and will have no substance until they are backed by the establishment of a much greater measure of free institutions in Poland.

We do not hinder the Soviet Union in projecting its ideas to us. The Soviet Weekly is printed and freely distributed in Great Britain. If we disagree with its contents, we challenge them in discussion, not by the imprisonment of its publishers. We have a legitimate right to ask for similar freedom in Poland and to project peacefully our way of life to the people of Eastern Europe; and we have an obligation to support, defend and protect those who are already doing so in Poland and other Soviet satellites.

People such as Morawiecki, Gorny and Karniej do not ask us to declare war on Soviet assumptions. They conduct their campaign in a peaceful but determined manner, and all that they ask for is our peaceful but equally determined support. Through the Minister of State, I ask our Government to continue to consider the reality of accusations levelled against people such as those three, to see through the false excuses that are made and to make it clear that British relations with Poland can be improved only when we see the reality of glasnost.

We should consider carefully how Poland responds. We should be prepared to increase the scope and content of the BBC world service's Polish language broadcasts so that it can reach more people in Poland more easily and for longer. We should even be prepared to consider the use of modern technology to beam uncensored programmes to Poland and to the other countries of Eastern Europe, which are deliberately deprived by their Governments of an unhindered supply of information. Above all, we must be seen determinedly to defend the voice of opposition and the freedom to speak and even to think.

If Mr. Gorbachev in the Soviet Union and General Jaruzelski sincerely want us to believe in their long-term intentions towards us—if they want us to believe that they are peaceful and honourable and that the only objectives that they have in mind are the welfare and prosperity of their people — they should refrain from harassing and arresting the very people who peacefully demand that they be permitted to follow the same objectives. We should not be afraid of saying that to them and of challenging their professed intentions every time that we have well-founded reasons to suspect them.

Some of what I have said has been harsh criticism, but it represents the genuine feelings of many in the United Kingdom who take a close interest in Poland. I do not want to be churlish. I recognise that there are the germs of change. However, the recent event of the Popieluszko amnesty has deeply shaken whatever confidence I had in the intentions of the Polish Government. Like many others, I shall remain prepared to accept every little piece of evidence of progress towards glasnost. I shall cheer any such evidence heartily if it is real evidence, but I have a long way to go to be convinced.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): We should be grateful to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) for raising this grave matter. Our interest in what happens in Poland stems not simply from the fact that there are large numbers of Polish people in this country who fought valiantly with us during the common struggle against the Nazis but who were unable to return to their homeland because of Stalin's brutal unilateral repudiation of the Yalta agreement. We are interested and we protest because the British people themselves are concerned at the continued denial of basic human rights in a land that suffered enough at the hands of Hitler and Stalin and deserves better treatment.

I had hoped that, following the visit of the British delegation to Warsaw in December 1986, which I had the honour to lead, we would see a great easing of the oppressive measures that the regime has seen fit to impose —after the Solidarity movement began to campaign for freedom. We have been sadly disappointed.

I have only a few minutes in which to speak and I am grateful to the Minister for permitting me to intervene. I wish, therefore, to make three specific points. First, while political prisoners incarcerated by the military dictatorship were released in September 1986, which was an encouraging sign, others have since been imprisoned on trumped-up charges because they continue to campaign for freedom, and for no other reason than that. I say "trumped-up charges" because that is the Communist way. The hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned the case of that brave priest Father Jerzy Popieluszko, who was charged with hoarding military weapons. When that charge was laughed out of court, they murdered him. Such trickery is disgraceful and indicates only too clearly that the regime knows that its authority does not rest upon the assent of the nation.

Secondly, when I was in Warsaw I specifically asked that the passport of Dr. Janus Onyszkiewicz — a dedicated leader of the Solidarity movement who had been a political prisoner and had been ill treated in prison—should be returned to him. He has relatives in this country. No charge has ever been brought against that brave and resolute Polish patriot who expresses the longing of all Poles for freedom. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister will make it plain that persecution of that kind cannot pass without censure and that the British Government will want to know why a passport continues to be witheld.

Harassment continues of groups not only of the Right and centre but of the Left. I wish to protest against the harassment of the Polish Socialist party by sporadic arrests and telephone threats. I, too, would contrast that with the soft treatment of the four brutal murderers of Father Popieluszko whose sentences have been substantially reduced. Their crime shocked not just the Polish nation but the whole of the civilised world. What kind of regime is it that behaves in this way?

Let there be no misunderstanding. The message from this House is that the British people want lasting friendship with the Polish people and want to see them free and prosperous, but the regime in Poland must be made to understand by one means or another that real detente will be possible only when it ceases to persecute its own people.

10.50 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Mellor): I congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) not only on stimulating this important debate but on attracting to it both the Father of the House and the Speaker—not a usual combination at this late hour. I am especially glad to see you, Mr. Speaker, in your place, as I know of your interest in Poland following your highly successful visit there just a few months ago.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery and my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), from whom I was delighted to hear, emphasised particular points about Poland and the way in which matters are conducted there, especially in relation to human rights. They have raised those points in all sincerity, just as we do, against the background of a long and good relationship between Britain and Poland and a great deal of good will from this country towards the Polish people, who have had to endure so much throughout history and not least in recent years.

Before dealing with the human rights dimension, I should like to consider more broadly Poland's position in the world today. In trade, Poland's large hard currency debts have meant that credits have not been available for major capital projects in recent years. Despite those difficulties, however, Poland is still Britain's largest export market in the Comecon area after the Soviet Union, and after West Germany, Britain is Poland's largest market in the West, so there is a strong trading relationship between us.

There are also substantial cultural and educational ties with Poland which are freer and more flexible than any other country in eastern Europe. The British Council, through its admirable British Institute in Warsaw which you, Mr. Speaker, may well have visited, together with the Polish Cultural Institute in London, plays an essential role in promoting and encouraging new forms of contact. A rich pattern of contact also exists independently of government, which is exactly as it should be, thro direct links between universities, learned socie institutions and individuals. Several hon. Members taken part in meetings of the Anglo-Polish round table I am glad that dates have been fixed for a further mee in Warsaw next May.

Another special factor in our relationship is the that Poland has so often been at the leading edge of cha in eastern Europe. The societies of eastern Europe a varying degrees weighed down by a discredited poli and economic system imposed on them by force by Soviet Union at the end of the last war. None has t readily to Marxism-Leninism—Poland perhaps leas all. Stalin himself said that introducing Communis Poland was like trying to saddle a cow. At last, howe the need for change—long recognised in Poland beginning to be recognised in the Soviet Union.

Against that background, I should like to trace br the recent history of our relations with Poland. One start, of course, with the period of Solidarity, which hon. and learned Member for Montgomery describe clearly in his speech. That period saw an admir attempt to make freedom of association and the rule of compatible with a Communist political monopoly. forcible suppression of Solidarity and the period of ma law came as a bitter shock to people in this country, inevitably caused damage to our relations with the P authorities.

Together with our allies and partners in the Euro Community, we pressed the Government of Ge Jaruzelski, in the months and years after December 1 to release political prisoners, restart a genuine dial with the Polish people, and return to the path consensus-based reform. That was the message which right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to General Jaruzelski and his colleagues during his vis Warsaw in 1985.

As my right hon. Friend said, that had some ef Recently, there have been signs of limited but neverth welcome steps forward in both the political and econ sphere. As the House knows, all those imprisoned clearly political charges were released in September 1 Plans for economic reform were revived and ce tentative steps have been taken towards a broadenin the basis of political life in Poland. I am sorry, as is right hon. Friend, if that process has slipped somewhat in the meantime.

Against that background, our political relations the Polish authorities have moved forward. Your visit, Speaker, was highly successful. Last month, the P Foreign Minister, Professor Orzechowski, paid an equ successful visit to London. A welcome by-product of visit was that we were assured by the Polish author just before it took place, that jamming of the BBC P service on short wave, about which we had protested many occasions, would cease from the start of this I am glad to tell the House that the jamming, which a clear breach of the undertakings in the Helsinki F Act, has indeed now ceased. An even more signifi outcome of Professor Orzechowski's visit was that it agreed when he saw my right hon. Friend the P Minister that she would pay a visit to Poland this ye have continued to raise cases of this sort with the Polish authorities. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary told Professor Orzechowski last month, during a detailed discussion of human rights, that he hoped all forms of harassment of supporters of Solidarity would cease.

I turn now to the issue of political prisoners. As House knows, after the releases of September 198 number of people remained in custody in Poland charges where there was arguably a political element.

In addition, the opportunity was also taken during Professor Orzechowski's visit to draw attention specifically to three cases, those of Mr. Morawiecki, Mrs. Lukowska-Karnie and Mr. Gorny, which have been of particular concern to hon. Members. Indeed, as the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery knows, several colleagues have written letters about these cases. We shall continue to raise issues of this sort, as necessary, with the Polish authorities.

On the two other points raised by my right hon. Friend, we think that it is deplorable that Mr. Onyskiewicz cannot visit his wife's family in the United Kingdom. We have urged the Polish authorities many times to restore his passport. Indeed, that matter was raised during Professor Orzechowski's visit. I very much hope for an early response. My right hon. Friend also raised the issue of the Polish Socialist party. I understand that a meeting in November to revive the old Polish Socialist party was broken up by the police. That is a regrettable example of the lack of freedom of expression in Poland and of the restrictions on genuine pluralism.

In the limited time available to me, I conclude by asking, what are the prospects for our bilateral relations with Poland, and for Poland itself? The external environment for our relations with Poland, as with the other east European countries, has undoubtedly taken a turn for the better with the recent improvement in the overall East-West climate. That presents opportunities that we do not want to miss, but our relations with individual countries still depend crucially on how those countries conduct their domestic affairs as well as their foreign policies.

When my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary met General Jaruzelski in 1985 he enjoined him to take meaningful steps towards not only economic, but political, reform. General Jaruzelski and his colleagues have now begun to show that they appreciate the importance of both sides of this equation. It is significant that in the recent referendum the Polish population was asked to express a view, not only on economic, but on political, reform. Naturally, the authorities intend such reforms to take place strictly within a framework which they will choose, but the message which Professor Orzechowski sought to give us last month was, clearly, that the Polish authorities regard the result of the referendum as positive and intend to press ahead with further measures at both the political and economic level.

That is welcome news, but it leaves many questions unanswered, such as the extent of economic reform, the programme involved, and the political dimension. How real will any new processes of consultation with the Polish people be? Will they provide for genuine freedom of association and trade union organisation? If not, how will the public react?

Those questions are vital to Poland's success and stability. They not only affect the prospects for trade and other aspects of relations between Britain and Poland, but could have a bearing on the future course of East-West relations. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will be pursuing these with General Jaruzelski during her visit. Meanwhile, the message that we shall continue to give to the Polish authorities is that we value our relationship with Poland and wish it to prosper, but political and economic reform remain vital if the relationship is to be as healthy and productive as we and the people of Poland would wish. We want to see progress on all those matters.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SERVICES

Torbay

1. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will arrange to meet the chairman of Torbay health authority to discuss health services in Torbay.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I am hoping to visit Devon later this year, but details have not yet been finalised.

Mr. Steen: When my hon. Friend goes to Torbay, will she congratulate the chairman of Torbay health authority, which has one of the highest bed occupancies in the country? The average length of in-patient stay is one of the shortest, and the cost is among the lowest in Britain. Will my hon. Friend also explain to the chairman how he is supposed to manage to run the health authority when the increase in funding this year has been 6·8 per cent., whereas the national wage increase has already been agreed at 8·4 per cent.? The authority cannot make ends meet.

Mrs. Currie: I understand that Torbay has one of the highest growth rates in allocation of money in the region. I note my hon. Friend's comments and will bear them in mind. However, I would say that the authority is showing other health authorities how to make ends meet. Results are what matter. I note with interest, for example, that the waiting time for hip joint replacement operations is 22 weeks in Torbay and six weeks in Newton Abbot.

Mr. Marlow: On her way to Torbay, I wonder whether my hon. Friend will——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think not today.

North West Regional Health Authority

2. Mr. Litherland: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he last met the chairman of the North West regional health authority; what matters were discussed; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Tony Newton): My right hon. Friend last met Sir John Page during a visit to the regional health authority headquarters in Manchester on 30 October 1987. He was told of the progress being made in improving patient services within the region.

Mr. Litherland: Is the Minister aware that, if that visit had taken place just before Christmas, they could have discussed—or indeed witnessed—engineers coming in to cut off the oxygen supply to the incubators for premature babies at St. Mary's hospital; and that, if it had taken place last week, they could have discussed with nurses why they were forced to strike? Do not those conditions show that the National Health Service is in the throes of a terminal disease for which the Government are not offering a remedy?

Mr. Newton: I am even more aware that, had my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State visited Manchester in the week before Christmas, he would have been able to point to the substantial additional funds that I had just made available to the North West regional health authority.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Has my right hon. Friend seen the excellent report from Sir John Page, which landed on our desks today, in which he points out the many savings being made in the region—particularly in purchasing policy — the vast increase in building of which my hon. Friend saw an example a few months ago, and the vast increase in patient care? That does not mean that we do not want more in Lancaster, we do. Nevertheless, it is doing very nicely.

Mr. Newton: I have not yet had the pleasure of seeing the report to which my hon. Friend referred, but I remember with pleasure my visit to her area to open some large new hospital facilities there.

Mr. Orme: When the meeting took place, was the crisis in the Salford area health authority discussed? Was there a discussion of the four wards that will have to close? Was it mentioned that the health authority must find £2 million per year into the 1990s, and that the money that has been allocated on a one-yearly basis is entirely unsatisfactory? What is the Minister going to do about the crisis in the inner cities—not least in Salford?

Mr. Newton: Among other things, we are seeking to improve the quality of primary care services in the inner cities, and that is an important part of the mix as a whole. With regard to my right hon. Friend's visit, of course the concerns that were expressed then were taken into account when we made substantial money available this year and an extra £700 million for the hospital and community health services, including those in the north-west, next year.

Preventive Medicine

3. Mr. Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what measures he intends to make health promotion and the prevention of ill health a central function of general medical practice.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. John Moore): Our plans are set out in the recently published White Paper "Promoting Better Health". Major changes are to be made in the system of payment to doctors to encourage them to provide a range of health promotion and preventive activities; for example, the introduction of incentive payments for reaching target levels of population cover for vaccination, immunisation and cancer screening and new payments for arranging and providing regular health promotion sessions for patients. The family doctors' contract with the National Health Service will be amended to make health promotion and the prevention of disease a specific part of their terms of service.

Mr. Patnick: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply, but I am sure that people in Sheffield would appreciate more detail. Will he give more details?

Mr. Moore: I appreciate my hon. Friend's comment. The first negotiating meeting with the General Medical Services Committee will take place this week on 14 January. We will discuss details with the profession. We hope to provide incentives for doctors to reach targets, as I have said, and we will pay a fee to encourage doctors to provide an initial clinical assessment for patients registering for the first time with an NHS doctor. We will also introduce sessional fees for doctors who run health promotion clinics. In addition, we will seek to negotiate the payment of the basic practice allowances depending on a doctor carrying out health promotion and prevention of ill-health activities.

Rev. Martin Smyth: While I welcome the Minister's statement about screening, will he accept that restricting free eye-testing will hinder detection, as optometrists detect what ophthalmologists diagnose, and that it will cost the Health Service more in the long run to end the free eye test?

Mr. Moore: I do not accept that any of our evidence suggests that in the long run charges deter people from seeking treatment. I hope the hon. Gentleman recognises what we are seeking to achieve in addition to the very substantial increases in moneys going into primary health care. That will enable us to increase resources, especially for inner city and rural areas.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: As regular check-ups are so much a part of private medicine, may I assume from the words "health promotion" that my right hon. Friend is now extending that service to the National Health Service so that the "fit person" medical will become part and parcel of the health of this country?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend is right. We are trying to ensure that we are as concerned with the promotion of good health as with simply eradicating sickness. To that extent, my hon. Friend will watch with interest, as I will, our negotiations with the medical profession to see that contracts reflect that.

Mr. Grocott: Is it not a fact that among the many causes of ill health have been the increases in unemployment, increases in homelessness and the abolition of nutritional standards for school meals? Is it not absolute hypocrisy for the Government to say that they are concerned about preventive medicine when they have allowed all those things to grow under their jurisdiction? Is it not the simple truth that the Government are making the country sick?

Mr. Moore: Most rational people who try the health of the nation with a sense of ra balance will understand the political hypocris question. Happily, the reality is that, Governments since the second world war, o over the past 40-plus years seen a patte improvement. We are now trying to supple adding to the promotion of good hea prevention of ill-health.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Did my right hon. out, before issuing his White Paper on primar as accurate as possible an assessment of the that will fall on family practitioner committe to have to process the immense number of it claims? What financial provision will be ma them to fulfil their function?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend has made point. Within the White Paper, which promoting health, we are seeking to responsibilities of the family practitioner co that extent we are committed to givi negotiation, additional resources to those co will allow them to carry out increased dutie

NHS Patients (Private Care)

4. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of St Services what is his policy towards contractin of National Health Service patients to the p sector on a commercial basis.

Mrs. Currie: In 1986, private hospitals p for over 41,000 NHS cases. This demonstr of partnership between the sectors, and we en local arrangements.

Mr. Fearn: Will the Minister confirm that for the sale of hospital land to American con in Britain are going ahead? Will those contr clause about contracting-out services?

Mrs. Currie: I am in some difficulty as I to which particular contracts the hon. Gent but if he tells me I shall give him more in them.

Mr. Page: Is my hon. Friend aware t exception of Belgium, Britain has the lowest from the private health sector as a percen national product of any other country? Wi right hon. Friend the Secretary of State hav our right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the see what can be done to encourage the pri make a greater effort in the health serv releasing funds for our National Health Se

Mrs. Currie: I am sure that my right ho take note of the points that have been made harness all available resources for the provi care. Some hon. Members insist that health entirely publicly funded. That is a dogmatic minded approach to a most important prob

Mr. Robin Cook: Does the Minister November her department released £250,00 midlands on the express condition that it sh on private operations? Is she aware that, o west midlands authority discovered that pri were charging £400 more for a hysterectomy and £700 more for a hip replacement than was being charged in its own hospitals? In the meantime, Wolverhampton has suspended all hip operations for the financial year. As it is clear from that experience that the NHS gives better value for money, why does the Minister leave its operating theatres empty while filling the pockets of commercial medicine?

Mrs. Currie: I take exception to the hon. Gentleman's synthetic indignation. The west midlands experience shows that it is important, right from the start, properly to negotiate cost-effective terms with the private sector, or indeed with anybody else. Our view is that the only question that matters is whether it helps the patient, as we expect cost effectiveness in all services.

Income-related Benefits

5. Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what recognition the new system of income-related benefits will give to the needs of families on low incomes.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Michael Portillo): Lower-paid working families will receive more help through family credit, which we expect to be received by over twice the number presently receiving family income supplement, at an extra cost of around £200 million; and we shall be spending around £100 million extra on families in income support, which replaces supplementary benefit.

Mr. Bowden: I am reassured by my hon. Friend's reply and I applaud the principle that the greatest help should be given to those in greatest need. Can he give actual figures of the families who will be receiving family credit in future, and can he say how those who are in need and are entitled to claim will be informed and encouraged to claim that entitlement?

Mr. Portillo: The total number of families should be about 470,000 compared with 200,000 who are receiving FIS today. We will launch a promotional campaign, on which we are spending £3 million.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Would the £50 or £60 that a child has saved in a building society out of weekly pocket money be taken into account for the assessment of supplementary benefit for the parents?

Mr. Portillo: The new rules refer to the resources of adults and exclude them from income support at £6,000, as opposed to £3,000 at present.

Mr. Roger King: Does my hon. Friend agree that we will be spending more on low-income families as a result of our social security reviews than has been the case until recently, and more than we would be spending if benefits such as child benefit had been index related?

Mr. Portillo: Yes. Even allowing for the changes in housing benefit, the extra money going to families is of the order of £200 million. That is nearly double the amount that would be required to uprate child benefits.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: Is the Minister aware that, under proposed changes in legislation, an unemployed head of the household who decides to undertake full-time education to increase his employment opportunities will lose out on benefits, including housing benefit, w be counter-productive to any scheme to encoura to undertake training?

Mr. Portillo: The provision for education is a matter from income support, which is there for t are available for work. The two are different mai systems.

In-patients (Statistics)

6. Mr. Carttiss: To ask the Secretary of State Services how many in-patient cases were treate Anglia in 1986 and 1978.

Mr. Newton: There were 195,628 in-pati treated in 1978 and 253,124 cases in 1986. T increase of 29·4 per cent. over the period.

Mr. Carttiss: Will my right hon. Friend con the RHA and the districts, in particular t Yarmouth and Waveney district, on achiev impressive improvement? Will he confirm that success could be recorded for out-patients and treatment?

Mr. Newton: Yes, indeed. The increase in ou was just under one quarter and in day cases no one half. That is a striking achievement and I a to pay tribute to the RHA and my hon. Friend health authority.

Sir Anthony Grant: Is not the result in East An more commendable when one reflects that the f which its funding is based are some five years old Huntingdonshire and, to some extent, Cambridg the fastest growing areas in the country? If th ludicrous state of affairs is the case, are not some are not so fast-growing doing very well indeed?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will be aware increase that I announced just before Christma year for the East Anglian regional health au among the highest in the country and reflects t population. We are always anxious to ensure method for distributing money reflects such fac up-to-date a way as possible.

Thames Regional Health Authorities

7. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of Social Services what is the percentage ch expenditure on hospital and community health s real terms, respectively, using the National Healt pay and prices deflator, in the four Thames regio authorities in total, between 1981-82 and the mo year for which figures are available.

Mr. Moore: Between 1981-82 and 1986- revenue expenditure in the four Thames region 29·4 per cent. Compared with the rise in general this represents a real terms increase of 1·2 National Health Service pay and price infla comparatively high across this period. Compa that measure Thames regions' expenditure dro some 2·8 per cent., although this was more than increased efficiency. Taking this into acco purchasing power of the Thames regions rose in r by 2 per cent., and, most important, the number treated in all specialties rose between 1982 and 19 per cent. in Greater London.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful for those figures, but if we look at them carefully do they not confirm that the most crucial part of the answer is that, as we have suspected for a long time, over the last five years in the south-east of England and the Thames regions there has been a cut in real terms in expenditure in the Health Service? Will the Secretary of State confirm that the Health Service is in such difficulties in the south-east, putting aside efficiency improvements and the rest, because the double effect of RAWP on inner London and south-east of England health districts means that they have suffered most from cuts? The consequences that we now see, in bed closures and the like, are the result of those figures, which have hit this part of Britain worse than any other.

Mr. Moore: First, let me remind the hon. Gentleman that, as I said, there has been a real terms increase. He will want to look at the figures with care, and I explained them with care. Secondly, he will not want to deny what his right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) did when he was involved in government, which was agreed by all parts of the House, when the RAWP process was introduced in 1977. Like the hon. Gentleman, I represent a London area constituency, so I am conscious of the Thames regions' position on RAWP. The reality for 10 years has been that, despite the increase to which I referred, and despite the happy increase in patient activity, London's population has fallen and its relative overprovision, as seen by the then Labour Government, has produced a pattern of acute bed reductions, which has continued ever since that period on roughly the same basis. But—this is the curcial point for hon. Members who represent London areas—in 1993, at the end of the strategic planning period, London will still have more beds per head of population than the national average.

Miss Widdecombe: Will the Minister consider urging one of those Thames authorities, namely, South East Thames—in the interests of efficiency and of increasing its income, on which expenditure depends—urgently to start realising the income from the numerous empty properties throughout the region for which it has no further use?

Mr. Moore: I bow to my hon. Friend's distinguished past and detailed knowledge of these matters. As she will know, in the new Health and Medicines Bill we are specifically encouraging the generation of income from health authorities' resources. I shall draw the attention of the region and the area to her remarks.

Mr. Leighton: Is it the Government's policy to starve the National Health Service of resources to bring about a crisis so that they can introduce new proposals for other methods of funding and thus undermine the principles of the NHS?

Mr. Moore: Such political partisan nonsense does the House and the country no service at all. The resources that have gone into the National Health Service over the past eight years have been immense. The essence of the question related to the nature of patients served.

It is interesting to note that between 1974 and 1979 in the area in question—the Thames region—the increase in acute patients and in-patients treated was 4 per cent., whereas since 1979 acute patient activity has increased by 15 per cent. That is the measure of real care about which we are concerned.

Mrs. Currie: The answers are non

Mr. Allen: The Prime Minister has public relations play of her concern abo

550 day nursery places for an under-

30,000 children. When will the Government start to put their money where the Prime Minister's mouth is and allow Nottinghamshire county council to give a day-care place to every child who needs it?

Mrs. Currie: I can confirm that the number of day nursery places provided by Nottinghamshire county council in 1986 was 555. In fact, it was Nottinghamshire county council that cut the number of places from 585 in 1984. However, the total number of day nursery places provided in that county council area has risen from 1,013 to 1,057 because the local authority is now relying far more heavily on private nursery places. If we bear in mind that Nottinghamshire county council has spent more on day nurseries in real terms and that their day nurseries are cheaper on average, that means that Nottinghamshire thinks that the private sector provides value for money in child care. I commend that attitude to the House.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the Minister recall that although the population of children under five between 1981 and 1985 increased by 141,000, only 500 extra places were made available? In view of the genuine concern about family poverty, which the hon. Lady should not dismiss, and the national debate reflecting people's concern about child welfare, is it not a matter of great urgency that local authorities—not just Nottinghamshire—are forced into making a choice between, for example, providing library facilities or day-care facilities? In view, also, of the great tragedies that have been discussed, especially in recent weeks, does the Minister accept that the Government have a responsibility, including a responsibility to improve vital resources?

Mrs. Currie: We have some old-fashioned views on that on this side of the House. We think that it is the parents' responsibility to care for their children. However, we recognise that day nurseries can help children in certain circumstances. Since the Government have been in power the total net spending by local authorities on all services has increased by 18 per cent. in real terms and has increased nearly twice as fast, by 35 per cent., on personal social services. If local authorities choose to spend that money, not on day nurseries but on peace committees and gay rights committees, that is their business.

Mr. Key: I should like to say how strongly I agree with my hon. Friend about the primary responsibility for young children being that of the parents. Therefore, may I ask my hon. Friend to continue to ensure that that kind of care facility is available only to those whose need is the greatest?

Mrs. Currie: Yes, I have a lot of sympathy with that view. It is worth putting the number of day nursery places into context. There are about 30,000 local authority day nursery places, nearly the same number in private and voluntary day nurseries, and about 250,000 children currently attend nursery classes in local authority schools. There are also child minders and play groups. Therefore, we are talking about a great deal of child care, most of which is provided by the parents themselves.

NHS Recruitment

problems in the National Health Service;

Mr. Moore: Since 1978, direct care sta

Mr. Moore: I know of my hon. Friend's connection with Wexham Park hospital, and that a modest improvement in recruiting is taking place there. He will be pleased to know that, already, several Whitley council management sides are seeking to negotiate, with our support, pay and grading structures that will enable the NHS to use staff more flexibly and take account of factors such as skill shortages and the pay rates needed to recruit and train staff in local labour markets. I know that my hon. Friend and the staff will welcome that.

Mr. Galbraith: Does the Secretary of State agree that the greatest barrier to recruitment in the National Health Service today is the low morale of its staff, and that that low morale is based on their belief that the Government are not committed to the Health Service? What does the right hon. Gentleman propose to do to improve the morale of staff in the service?

Mr. Moore: Like the hon. Gentleman, who served the National Health Service well for many years, I gather—[Interruption.] I fully accept that he did. Like him, I recognise the problem of morale. However, I genuinely ask him and hon. Members on both sides of the House whether the morale of the service, which has existed for 40 years, and into which vast amounts of money have been placed, and continue to be placed, will be improved by the quality of debate that we have been having in the last few minutes. I doubt it.

I shall seek to do what I said I would do earlier—to encourage health authorities to improve recruitment by, for example, increasing male recruitment and by making greater efforts to attract and recruit mature entrants. Many of the things that health authorities are now doing, as well as the large resources that are being put into the NHS, will make people realise the Government's commitment to it.

Mr. Hanley: Does my right hon. Friend intend to tackle the two great problems that exist in the north-west Thames area in particular, as well as in the south-west Thames area, of a declining percentage of those leaving school choosing to go into the nursing profession and the fact that, at the same time, there are declining school rolls?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The change in demography is one of the fundamental problems that we face. We are considering very carefully the UKCC project 2000 proposals, which is looking at ways of widening the entry gate for nurses as well as encouraging qualified staff to return to nursing. Obviously, at this time, it is important that we do all that we can to encourage that.

Mr. Robin Cook: Will the Secretary of State express a view on whether the new subsistence payments will increase or reduce his recruitment problems? Is he aware, with the blood transfusion service, that that new arrangement will result in a cut of more than £10 a week for staff who are paid less than £100 a week? If that is so, is the right hon. Gentleman really surprised that the result of that arrangement has been to provoke outrage among those penalised? Will he reconsider this arrangement, which is patently unjust and is hitting hardest those who are lowest paid?

Mr. Moore: I am delighted that t raised that point. The changes i subsistence, over which there has action, formed part of an agreement freely by the staff side. Nevertheless

Mr. Scott: I am as anxious as anyone, and certainly as anxious as my hon. Friend, to make sure that the procedures are dealt with speedily and completed. I believe that it is more important that we should get the answer right than meet artificial deadlines.

Mr. Wigley: Does the Minister accept that this problem has existed for months and that if he is to introduce an interim solution surely he should be in a position to do so by now? Therefore, can the Minister give a categorical assurance that the interim solution will be in place and effective by 1 April?

Mr. Scott: It is certainly my clear intention that that should be so. If, by any chance, it were not in effect by 1 April, I would consider the matter carefully to ensure that any subsequent claims were back-dated to 1 April, but I intend to meet the needs of this small group of people in a flexible way by 1 April.

Mrs. Beckett: Does the Minister not realise that, since the problem was identified in 1985, a whole variety of solutions have been put forward and that every time they have fallen because of the Government's unwillingness to put in further resources? How do they square that with the claim that these so-called reforms will target help on those in greatest need, when the biggest single losers will be the most severely disabled?

Mr. Scott: The hon. Lady should give us credit for the extra resources going in next April to cope with the problems of the disabled as a whole. Over £60 million extra is going in to cope with the needs of the disabled. Give us credit for that. There is a small group of people who, because of the complexities of the existing system, will not be dealt with in the same way from April. I am determined to find a solution to that and I hope that I shall have the hon. Lady's support.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 January.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Yeo: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the continuing strength of British industry not only reflects the success of her Government's economic policies but generates the resources that enable tax to be cut at the same time as spending on public services is being increased?

The Prime Minister: Yes. The Government's policies of sound finance and incentives for enterprise have led to seven years of successive growth and, now, falling unemployment. The prospects for the coming year, with the continuation of the same policies, are good.

Mr. Kinnock: When consultants in every area of medicine report that they are failing to meet urgent patient need, and when parents in so many cases are desperate because of the delays in urgent treatment children, will the Prime Minister tell us wh that the crisis of underfunding in the N Service is now over?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon aware, an extra £100 million was announ Christmas, which brings the extra spendin about £870 million, and there will be spending on the Health Service next ye Service on the whole has had greatly expa Indeed, it has expanded by 30 per cent. inflation during the lifetime of the Gover

The Prime Minister: As my right hon. F the Abortion Act does not permit abortions of the sex of the foetus alone. Any eviden my right hon. Friend should go to the Sec for Social Services. It will be examined a because allegations of this kind are and mus seriously indeed.

Q2. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Prime Mi list her official engagements for Tuesday 1

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. La that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Mahon: How does the Prime Minis fact that, according to official statistics country, alone of all European countries increase in infant deaths?

The Prime Minister: That is correct, up to the first year. There has been an enormous increase in the number of babies saved immediately at birth and during the first month after birth. We do not know the reason for that particular figure. It may well be that it is a statistical error. If the hon. Lady will look at the report of the Health Service, she will find a fantastic number of improvements in the Health Service that have taken place over this period.

Q3. Mr. Baldry: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Baldry: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that all the signs are that in 1987 Britain was top of the growth league among major economies and that a recent poll showed that 97 per cent. of leading industrialists believe that the Government's policies will lead to continuing economic improvement? If we continue to grasp the excalibur of enterprise, can we not continue to be one of the most successful economies in the world, with all the attendant political influence that that gives to the country?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that our policies have gained the confidence not only of domestic investors but of overseas investors, who are anxious to come to the country. The growth, and the way in which we have tackled our problems, have meant that we have had far more influence abroad since the Government has been in power. It will continue to increase because of the way in which we have tackled our problems at home.

Dr. Thomas: Does the Prime Minister recollect that in March last year she officially opened the Ysbyty Gwynedd, albeit the hospital had already been opened three years previously? Is she now aware that the authority is labouring under an accumulated underfunding of £2 million? What is she telling us, as Members of Parliament for that authority, to tell the people of Gwynedd, who are faced with substantially reduced services under the control of her Welsh Office?

The Prime Minister: I remember the visit very well. The hospital was working extremely well and both patients and medical staff were extremely happy with it. I do not recognise what the hon. Member is saying. Vastly increased resources for the Health Service have been provided for Wales, because under the policies of the Government we have had growth which has enabled us to have both tax cuts and increased resources for the Health Service.

Q4. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Smith: I refer my right hon. Friend again to the Ministerial and Other Salaries Order 1987, which took effect on 1 January. In view of the disgraceful scenes in the House yesterday and the continuing inability of the Opposition Chief Whip to——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not the responsibility of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Smith: In view of the——

Hon. Members: Name him.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member cannot ask a question about the actions of the Opposition Chief Whip.

Mr. Smith: May I ask my right hon. Friend whether she believes, in the light of what occurred yesterday afternoon, that the salaries payable under the order can possibly be justified?

The Prime Minister: The salaries under the order have passed through the House and no one has any power, short of there being another motion, to change them. I agree with the spirit behind my hon. Friend's question. As this is the mother of Parliaments, we in this House have a very heavy responsibility for the way in which we conduct our proceedings, and a heavy responsibility always to support Mr. Speaker in the excellent way that he carries out his task.

5. Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Livingstone: Will the Prime Minister take time in what remains of today to consider whether her Ministers may have inadvertently misled Parliament in 1982 when they reported to the House that the inquiry by Sir George Terry in relation to the Kincora boys' home would be fair and impartial? In order to do so, will she ask to see the confidential Sussex police files concerning investigated allegations linking Anthony Blunt with several promiment figures in Northern Ireland, who escaped prosecution for their crimes because, had a prosecution been brought, it would have revealed the immunity granted to Anthony Blunt? Were her Ministers aware when they appointed Sir George Terry, who was chief constable of Sussex, that his officers had been involved in this cover-up?

The Prime Minister: Prosecution is not a matter for me. It is a matter for the prosecuting authorities. If the hon. Gentleman has any new evidence, he should present it to them.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: In the light of the many cases of alleged child abuse, will my right hon. Friend base her social policies firmly on the need to strengthen family life and to educate young people for parenthood, rather than give greater control of children to social workers and doctors? While retaining penalties for those who mistreat children, will my right hon. Friend recognise that the upbringing of children is a matter for parents?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of family life and the lessons that are learnt at home. He links his question to child abuse, but he will be the first to know that this presents very sensitive problems to social workers and other people who have to decide when to go into a home because they think that a child is being abused, neglected or ill-treated. It is not an easy question for anyone to answer, but it is supremely important and involves social workers, legislators and neighbours.

Q6. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Ms. Armstrong: I am sure that the Prime Minister will want to assure the House that she is concerned about the protection of public health standards, particularly in relation to the prevention of AIDS and cervical cancer. Will she therefore assure us that she will not allow the back-door privatisation of pathology laboratories in order to save money, and that she will make sure that the protection of standards is the most important, indeed the only, issue that she is prepared to consider?

The Prime Minister: The protection of standards applies equally to the public and private sectors. It is the protection of standards that is important, not whether things are carried out in the public or private sector. If they can be carried out with better value for money in the private sector, that releases more money for more health care.

Sir Antony Buck: During the course of the day, will my right hon. Friend take time to consider material that she will have gathered from her highly successful tour of Africa? Is she aware that the vibes coming to those of us who recently visited Kenya suggest that it was an enormously valuable visit in assisting President Moi to deal with the difficult problems of containing racism and tribalism?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend. It was an extremely interesting and valuable visit. Kenya and this country have a very friendly relationship. We give considerable aid to Kenya, something of the order of £50 million. One was able to see the excellent use to which that was put and the very good way in which that country is run.

Newport, West

Q7. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister whether she has any plans to pay a further visit to Newport, West.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Mr. Flynn: Is the Prime Minister aware of the deep public anxiety felt by the people of Newport, West about the possibility of a new nuclear power station being added to the most crowded nuclear park in Europe, with eight nuclear reactors within a 25-mile radius of 2¼ million people? Is the Prime Minister aware of a statutory instrument which was introduced on the final sitting day before Christmas which will severely restrict the ability of the 8,000 protestors to present their case as fully and fairly as they could have done in the past? What action will the Prime Minister take to guarantee the right of protestors to present their case without obstacle or obstruction and with sufficient time?

The Prime Minister: I think that the rights of protestors at any planning inquiry in this country exceed those in almost any other country. They are considerable. Any difficulty or protest should be presented either to the inquiry or to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Department of Trade and Industry

3.31 pm

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I will make a statement about major changes in the role of the Department of Trade and Industry and its policies.

My right hon. and noble Friend Lord Young and I have been engaged in a major review of the main activities and organisation of DTI. Our decisions are set out in the White Paper entitled "DTI — the department for Enterprise" which will be laid before the House later today.

We conducted this review building on the new objectives for the DTI which we published on 13 October last year. In our opinion, considerable changes in the Government's support to industry will be required to face the challenges of 1992 and to succeed against ever increasing international competition.

In an economy with a GDP of some £400 billion, the main role of DTI, with its budget of £1 billion, must be, in conjunction with other Departments, to influence attitudes and to encourage open markets in order to promote enterprise and prosperity.

We will start by helping young people to learn about business and enterprise. We will work with employers with the aim of giving one teacher in 10 each year some personal experience of the world of business. We will further aim to ensure that every young person will have at least two weeks' work experience before leaving school as part of his or her preparation for employment.

We will help young people to become more knowledgeable about new technology. We shall increase our support for computer aided design and other advanced technologies in schools, further education and teacher training colleges.

We will work in partnership with commerce and industry to improve management education and development and spread awareness of best practices in new technologies. These are essential to the competitiveness of British industry and commerce.

We will help small and medium size firms to improve their performance in marketing, design, quality and advanced manufacturing methods. We are putting in hand forthwith a major new initiative to encourage firms with fewer than 500 employees to take expert consultancy advice in these key management functions. We will extend the programmes in April to cover business planning and financial and information systems. We will provide more than £50 million in the next financial year and some £250 million in total in the three years to 1991 to encourage firms to take advantage of this initiative.

In 1992 the single European market will be completed, ending most barriers to trade within the EC. The opening of the Channel tunnel in 1993 will make us physically a part of this much bigger market for all our goods and services. We will therefore make it a priority to help business prepare for, and benefit from, this great extension of the market within which we must compete.

The need to open up competitive markets is an essential strand in DTI's policies. Competition policy is the key element in that process.

As a result of the review which my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced in the House in June 1986, we propose a fundamental overhaul of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act. It has been proved increasingly ineffective in controlling damaging illegal cartels. The new legislation which we are considering would prohibit agreements with anti-competitive effects. It would be backed by stronger investigative powers and effective penalties. A detailed Green Paper on this will be issued shortly.

The review also covered mergers. The main but not exclusive consideration in mergers policy will continue to be the need to maintain competitive market conditions. We are proposing two principal changes to speed up the decisions on whether individual mergers can go ahead. The first would be a new formal, but voluntary, procedure for giving advance notice of prospective mergers. This would give automatic clearance for simple cases within four weeks. The second proposal would give more flexibility in dealing with possible competition problems. The Director General of Fair Trading would have the power to obtain legally binding undertakings from the parties to a merger over such issues as agreed divestment as an alternative to a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

We are particularly concerned to encourage enterprise in the less prosperous areas of the country and in the inner cities—[Interruption.]—and we are having great success in doing so. We shall therefore be increasing and strengthening DTI's regional office network and expanding its role. The new consultancy initiatives which I have just announced will offer higher levels of grant both in the assisted areas and in urban programme areas outside the assisted areas. Consultancy projects will receive support of two thirds of the cost in those areas compared with 50 per cent. in the rest of the country.

New incentives will be introduced from April this year to encourage the growth and development of small firms in development areas. Their growth will help the full revival of regional economies, which is the aim of our policy. Firms with fewer than 25 employees will be able to apply for investment grants of 15 per cent. towards the cost of fixed assets and innovation grants of 50 per cent. for product and process development. We shall be targeting our help on those firms at a critical stage of their development, those which may not yet have developed the key management skills needed to survive and compete. Our policies are designed to encourage self-generated business development in the regions, both in manufacturing and in services, so that there is a broader, lasting base for economic growth.

Regional selective assistance will remain available in the development and intermediate areas. Unlike regional development grant, regional selective assistance requires companies to show that they genuinely need public money in order to proceed, and that their projects are viable and will produce identifiable and significant benefits. Internationally mobile projects, for example, will therefore be able to benefit from regional selective assistance as before.

We have concluded that this approach to business development will do more to strengthen regional economies than an automatic subsidy to all capital investment. A Bill will therefore be introduced today to end the RDG scheme. No new applications for grant will be accepted after 31 March this year. The Bill will provide for transitional arrangements. These changes will apply in Scotland and Wales as well as in England, and I am speaking on behalf of my right hon. Friends the respective Secretaries of State for those territories. Regional policy will remain based on the existing regional map. Let me make it clear that we are not proposing any reduction in the Government's total regional spending, but we believe that existing resources can be spent more effectively than hitherto.

Inner cities will be benefit from the higher level of grant for the consultancy initiatives. The Government will be publishing a review of their policies for the inner cities in due course and will be taking steps to encourage more private sector involvement in urban regeneration.

We have also reviewed our Department's policy on civil research and development. In future we shall concentrate our help on collaborative research projects and the transfer of technology which would otherwise not take place. The White Paper announces our support for new collaborative programmes in both information technology and superconductivity. Research and development which is at the stage of commercial exploitation should be the responsibility of the private sector. The general schemes of single-company support for innovation are therefore being ended today. We believe that our spending on research and development will be more effectively used in collaborative research bringing different companies and the academic world much closer together.

DTI will be a catalyst for enterprise, innovation and change. But enterprising attitudes will develop only in open markets. We will therefore continue our efforts to cut red tape so that business can concentrate on its primary task of creating the wealth on which society depends.

The proposed changes in policies which I have announced will result in an increase in spending by DTI over the provision that was planned last year. Our proposed expenditure on regional programmes in Great Britain represents an increase over earlier plans. We will also increase previously planned expenditure and support for collaborative research, technology transfer and small business innovation.

The White Paper also announces changes in the organisation of DTI which will enable it to be more effective in the delivery of its services. The enterprise initiative will be marketed clearly and strongly so that business is aware of the potential for action through self-help, and the expansion of our regional network will enable us to get closer to our customers where they live and work.

Furthermore, industry divisions in DTI, which up to now have been seen as sponsoring specific industries, will be replaced by market divisions which focus on the markets for a range of goods and services rather than specific supplier industries. Emphasis will be given in our work to issues which span all industry and commerce, especially in technology.

The changes which are announced in the White Paper are very comprehensive, and reflect the objectives which we set for DTI last year. Real change, to give Britain a lasting basis for prosperity, requires individuals to alter the way in which they manage their businesses and approach their work. The best way to accomplish this is to influence people's attitudes, to help them acquire the skills and information which they need to compete effectively and to give them the scope and opportunity in open markets to compete. The White Paper policies which I have outlined today represent this consistent and co-ordinated strategy for enterprise. DTI—the Department for enterprise—will now carry this enterprise strategy forward.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): This is obviously a statement of major importance for the regions and industry of our country, and we trust that there will be a full debate on it before too long. Our view is that it represents the culmination of a process that, stripped of its pretensions, ends today in the effective abandonment of the regional policy of successive Governments over 25 years. Whatever the rhetoric, the reality of these proposals will be devastating in its consequences for the unity of the country and the vitality of our industry.

Will the Minister agree with me that the whole credibility of his package hangs on his pledge to maintain funding? Will he admit that the principal part of regional aid is regional development grant, which is now to be cut, that from 1979 to 1986 a £300 million cut in regional grant occurred, that this year there is a projected further cut of £300 million and that now regional development grant is to be abandoned altogether? Is it surprising that we regard this pledge as an empty promise signifying nothing?

Does the Minister agree with the survey made by his own Department, that regional development grant has saved or created some 600,000 jobs over the past few years — 40,000 in the past year alone? Now that regional development grant is to be abandoned, leaving only regional selective assistance, is he seriously telling us that he expects, if funding is to remain level, a fivefold increase in successful applications for regional selective assistance? How many capital projects will now have to be abandoned? How many small firms entitled to automatic help will now no longer get it? The main reason why regional development grant is important is that it provides certainty, stability and international capital—and our own capital demands that.

We welcome any proposal that assists small businesses and any new grants that help them, but why does help for small businesses have to come at the expense of help for large ones? Is not the truth of the matter, as any industrialist will tell us, that regions need small and large businesses to succeed?

The Minister talked about his new business consultancy centres. Will he tell us whether the funds for those centres will be on top of the existing programmes or will come out of that money? He talked of a one-stop shop. We in the north-east have been asking for a one-stop shop for years: it is called the northern development agency. Will we obtain that under his proposals?

The truth is that many of the proposals will cover a wide range of matters, and will require careful scrutiny. Let me pick the Minister up on one in particular—the Government's competition policy. I welcome the implicit recognition that competition policy under the present Government has been a lamentable failure. If the Minister wishes to examine the ways in which he can open up competition policy, he might start with his own privatised industries, British Airways and British Petroleum.

I also ask the Minister — [Interruption.] — With respect, this was a detailed statement, and we are entitled to make a detailed reply.

What is surprising about this document is what it omits, as well as what it puts in. Where is there any recognition from the "Department of enterprise" that we have one of the largest balance of trade deficits in manufacturing industry? Where is the acknowledgment that we are falling behind in science and technology? Why is the only proposal on research and development to chop one part of it? Where are the bold new initiatives, the new seizing of opportunities?

Ultimately, the proposals are nothing but philosophy without cash. Why cannot the Minister understand that what industry wants is not the absence of Government, but their presence in partnership; not a retreat into the attitudes of the 19th century, but a willingness to meet the challenges of the 21st?

Mr. Clarke: My right hon and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and every other member of the Government, including myself, are not going to abandon regional policy. We are, however, changing it drastically, because we think that we can make it more effective. The hon. Gentleman had plainly prepared the section of his questions dealing with regional policy before he listened to the statement, and did not follow the statement when I made it.

Certainly regional development grants will be cut. We prefer to concentrate on regional selective assistance, new investment grants for small companies in the development areas and preferential rates of grants for new consultancy services, which will strengthen the quality of businesses in the regions — particularly small and medium size businesses — to ensure that they are genuine, lasting, successful businesses and not just branch-line enterprises.

The hon. Gentleman was right to say that, in the past, we have made claims for the regional development grant, which was a very useful instrument of regional policy. However, we are now changing the nature of the grant because of the change in economic circumstances. Most notably, a huge increase in investment is going ahead in the regions, and unemployment is now falling faster there than in the rest of the United Kingdom. The time has therefore come for a system that gives a grant to any applicant for any capital investment, regardless of whether that grant is needed to make a project go ahead, and regardless of any tests of the viability or commercial desirability of what is proposed.

We shall be able to make use of selective assistance to assist projects which would not go ahead without Government aid, and which are of demonstrated commerical value to the region, as well as introducing the new grants for smaller firms and the new advisory services on preferential terms in the assisted areas.

The Labour party's commitment to the regions is obviously based on being wedded to the traditional policies, come what may. Labour Members do not acknowledge that the Government are making more sensible use of an increased sum over the next three years, compared with published plans, in the light of the improved economic climate.

I am delighted by what I took to be a welcome for the enterprise initiative—the new advisory services for small business. At this late stage, I will not invite the hon. Gentleman to join me and my colleagues on the platform as we launch the enterprise initiative across the country. However, as he supports improved services for small businesses and the strength of small business, I am sure that he will continue to give support to and approv what we do as we develop and promote the new p that we are proposing for customers in business.

I did not quite understand the hon. Gentle comments on total spending. If he examines the Paper to be published shortly by my right hon. Frie Chancellor of the Exchequer, he will find that, com with what was planned in previous years, DTI spen increased for the next few years concentrating on re and development and regional policy of the kind have described.

I am sure that those who examine competition in more depth than the hon. Gentleman will find th proposal is an improvement on the present position will rebut the hon. Gentleman's general economic He referred to industrial policy in an industrial ec that is now the most successful in western Euro referred to changes in policy that I believe will supp continued revival of the British economy, particul the regions, and the continued fall in unemployme

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): My right ho learned Friend should ignore the Opposition's c criticism because under no circumstances can any his right mind say that the economy today is not in shape than it was when we took it over, with prod up and borrowing down.

My right hon. and learned Friend's statement welcomed warmly, particularly by business. The in ment of the education system with the business should have happened years ago. Is my right ho learned Friend aware that we welcome the change has suggested in mergers and the competitiven British industry, which is increasing?

The Government have got it absolutely Unemployment will fall only if we have more businesses. Unemployment will be reduced as a re the emphasis on small business and through the gra will be given to small business—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I apologise for stopping th Gentleman, but many right hon. and hon. Membe to participate. Hon. Members must ask questions a make speeches.

Mr. Clarke: I thank my hon. Friend and I agr it is essential that we continue to improve the links b industry and schools. Pupils and parents want the links between business and industry to prepare people for employment. A great deal is already bein but we have set ourselves ambitious targets to impr contact of teachers and pupils with industry. We the co-operation of industry and the employers provide that contact.

I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend's co about the key nature of small and medium size b The growth in employment in the economy ha spectacular over the past few years, and almost all growth has arisen in the small and medium size b sector. We must concentrate on strengthening further.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I have only just opportunity to look through the statement. W Minister tell the House what references there are trade unions in the document?

Mr. Clarke: The right hon. Gentleman need disadvantaged. The hon. Member for Sedgefiel

Blair), the Opposition Front Bench spokesman, was present but did not listen to the statement. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman starts from the same point as his colleague.

There is no mention of the trade unions in the document, but all trade unionists who wish to see a strengthening of the economy and growing prospects for employment will, I believe, support our objectives.

Mr. Leon Brittan (Richmond, Yorks): Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the vast majority of his proposals will be welcomed as being imaginative and constructive? Will he also accept that, in spite of the fact that economic growth is proceeding in all the regions, the discrepancy in the levels of employment between the different regions means that an active and vigorous regional policy should remain a top priority of the Government?

Will my right hon. and learned Friend also accept that, although there is nothing sacrosanct about previous methods of assistance, there were real advantages in a system whereby a business man was aware that, if he satisfied a published criterion, he was entitled as of right to regional assistance instead of having to go cap in hand to civil servants or Ministers asking for discretion to be exercised?

Does my right hon. and learned Friend therefore agree that if the Government are to have the necessary support to show that this policy is an improvement in regional policy and not a cut, they will, above all, have to satisfy the country that when all the proposals have been implemented the amount of money being spent on regional policy in real terms is at least as much as it is today?

Mr. Clarke: I took pleasure a moment ago in the rapidly falling rate of unemployment in the regions of Britain. I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend that the discrepancies are still excessive. As we change regional policy, we want to ensure that it continues to be effective, and to operate policies which reduce those discrepancies.

My right hon. and learned Friend is right in saying that the regional development grant carried with it an element of certainty. However, that certainty came from the fact that, whenever investment took place at the right place on the map, after the investment decision had been taken, it was possible for any investor to get a public sector contribution, whether or not he needed it, to go ahead with that investment. The time has come, when the economy is doing so well and when so much investment has been spontaneously generated, for us to look at ways of using that money more effectively in the regions, and it is important that we do that.

Particularly valuable are those parts of the policy that concentrate on strengthening the quality of management and business performance in the regions. The regions do not want second-class small and medium size businesses. They do not want an economy dominated by manufacturing at the expense of services. They want an economy as effective as that in the south, and of the same type as that in the south. Moving towards that, the support that we are giving to improving management, quality, design and financial control at preferential rates in the development areas will be of particular value. We must make sure that our policies support the continued improvement of the regions vis-a-vis the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Will the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster accept that there will be considerable dismay in the regions of England, Scotland and Wales that the proposals represent an extension of the stranglehold of central Government on the administering of regional funds? Would it not be more appropriate if the regions were given more discretion and control to determine their own priorities?

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that one of the problems facing Britain today is the imbalance between the south of England and the rest of the country in terms of control and ownership of enterprise and industry, and that there is nothing in the White Paper to reverse that process? Will he accept that, in spite of his assurances about small businesses, in reality it will be the biggest firms that will have the slickest presentation and will secure a greater share of the grants than is now the case? If he really wishes to help small businesses, will he assist them in their role as unpaid tax collectors and administrators for central Government, as many of them would welcome that?

The Minister's conversion on competition policy will be welcomed on these Benches, but it is regarded, after eight years, as rather late, in view of the Government's record in creating some of the biggest centralist cartels and monopolies in the world, such as British Telecom and British Gas, and his total failure to stand up to the takeover of British Caledonian by British Airways. Will he tell the House—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) gave a detailed response to the statement. I shall do the same. Will the Minister tell the House what is to happen to the regulation of competition provided by those companies in future? There is an urgent need for a parliamentary debate on that matter. There is a great deal in the White Paper and the Government should provide time to ensure that it is fully and properly discussed.

The Minister has not shown that he understands the needs of the regions, or of competition and enterprise.

Mr. Clarke: I certainly do not think that the White Paper represents any extension of centralised control. I share the reservations expressed by many hon. Members about over-centralised administration by government in London over the rest of the country. I have announced today—I referred to it twice in the statement—that we are greatly extending the regional network of the DTI and getting closer to our customers, who are the managers of business and commerce in the regions, and we will be shifting the balance of our work to the regions to deliver the new policies. Nothing that I and my right hon. and noble Friend are proposing will intrude on the considerable amount of devolved power that is already exercised by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. The Scottish Development Agency will be used as the agency for a large part of the policy north of the border.

With regard to large companies taking advantage of the proposals that we have announced, the hon. Gentleman will see that the emphasis is in completely the opposite direction. The new grants in the development areas are concentrated on the smallest firms with up to 25 employees. The new enterprise initiative is aimed at small and medium size businesses across Great Britain with up to 500 employees. Therefore, we are looking in the direction of helping small and medium size businesses in particular.

The hon. Gentleman talked about businesses as tax collectors. Deregulation and the cutting of red tape is also an important part of our policy to help small companies.

On competition, I advise the hon. Gentleman to await our Green Paper on restrictive trade practices and to look in detail at our proposed reforms of competition policy. We are strengthening and modernising that area of policy, and our aim is to make open, competitive markets, which means guarding against monopoly and unfair cartels.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I heard the Minister say that a Bill was to be introduced which will allow a debate on the matter. Therefore, I ask hon. Members to confine themselves to short rather than long and rambling questions.

Mr. Norman Tebbit (Chingford): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the general thrust of moving away from automatic grants paid regardless of need or the viability of a scheme will be welcomed, but will he explain how the placing of an excessive load on applicants will be avoided, and, similarly, how he will avoid officials becoming unduly embroiled in taking commercial decisions on behalf of businesses?

Mr. Clarke: I welcome my right hon. Friend's support for the abolition of automatic regional development grant. Having been in the Department of Trade and Industry, he will appreciate that if one is against automatic regional development grant, any type of grant that is retained will be selective and some process must be applied. I assure him that we appreciate the need to make sure that that process does not become bureaucratic, onerous for the applicant or gives too much arbitrary power to those administering it. We shall obviously be relying on the Industrial Development Advisory Board, which is composed of senior outside industrialists appointed to advise us on the commercial appraisal of projects, and many outside secondees with industrial and commercial experience who move in and out of the Department are helping us to appraise projects.

We shall be concentrating on the key test, not just rewriting the business plans of an applicant. We shall make sure that so-called additionality—the requirement for grant in order to enable a project to go ahead—will be the key point on which we concentrate. For the smaller firms, all that can be too onerous and that is why we have proposed a special scheme for the development areas. Grants for companies under the ceiling of 25 employees will be operated in a much more streamlined way with just a check to make sure that there is commercial viability. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Hon. Members on both sides of the House should not shout across the Chamber. The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) did so once before, and I did not like it.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): The right hon. and learned Gentleman's statement is nowhere near as good as he makes out because it completely ignores the real terms cuts in regional aid since 1979. Does he guarantee that large British companies seeking and expand in Wales will not be worse off as a the statement? Is it not the case that the Secretar for Scotland and Wales fiercely resisted the pr abolish regional development grants? Is no statement a real body blow to the hopes of Wale on the ashes of unemployment and to mak economy?

Mr. Clarke: In making the comparison with hon. Gentleman is going back to the first stages o development grant when grant was paid auto regardless of its effect in creating jobs. Sometim were given to huge capital intensive investme replaced employees in firms receiving the gran why when we moved, I think three years ago, to t stage of regional development grant, makin subject to a cost per job limit and linking them intensive parts of the economy, it was generally v That inevitably resulted in some worthwhile s public expenditure because the money expended was not going on the chosen object certainly not true to say that there has competition between the territorial Departments hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Sco Wales agreed with the policy and will derive be it.

On regional development grant and regiona assistance alone this year, the Department of Industry looks like spending £254 million comp a planned spend in last year's White Paper of £2 By 1990-91 that will have gone up to £26 compared with the figure of £232 million based White Paper. Therefore, there is an increase in ex on previous years' approved plans. However, it level of expenditure in which I really take comfo more intelligent and sophisticated use of the mo bears more relation to today's economic circum growth, expansion and rising employment in t already.

Mr. Michael Heseltine (Henley): Will my righ learned Friend accept that we support his at obtain better value for money from the existin programme, but will he recognise that overlyin policy and far more damaging to the regio present tax regimes which have the effect, thr capital nature, of destroying family busine through the subsidies that flow to the pension financial institutions, of draining far more mo the regions than any other regional policy replace? Will my right hon. and learned Friend right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequ we can try to introduce some fiscal neutrality b regions and the centre which could enable small to grow in the provinces and remain locally controlled there?

Mr. Clarke: I shall certainly consult my Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is on the Front Bench. I think that my right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) will conce Government have made great advances in burden of capital taxes on small businesses, ar start-ups in particular. We now have the low corporate taxation in the EC, an important business and to profitable business in par addition, I cannot help mentioning that the unified business rate will bring enormous advantages to the north of England in particular and will represent a massive shift of public resources from the south of England to the north when it takes full effect in 1990.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): Since Ford's decision to locate in Dundee would not have been made without regional development grants, can the Minister assure us that the one-door approach used by the Scottish Development Agency, Dundee district council and Tayside regional council to attract industry to Dundee will not be affected by the changes that he has announced this afternoon?

Mr. Clarke: I will refer the hon. Gentleman's point about Dundee to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. I think that he is telling me that it will not be affected.

I agree that regional development grant has played a major part in getting us to where we are now, but I am now explaining the need for change to make better use of the sums of money about which we are talking. We have the support, for example, of the Scottish Council (Development and Industry), which recently reported to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland on enterprise development—the next stage in the evolution of regional policy. Section 3(5) on page 4 said:

> "Despite the division of opinion on direct intervention in investment decisions the balance of opinion favours some form of grant aid, albeit on a selective rather than automatic basis."

That is the position that we are now contemplating.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): While I applaud my right hon. and learned Friend's initiative in seeking to link Government sponsorship of research with market opportunities, may I ask him if he will extend that initiative and examine the opportunity that presents itself for the Government to examine their own position as a customer in the market place and to try to co-ordinate some of their public purchasing policies to achieve a stimulus of research in return? In that context, will he comment on his further views of the Alvey follow-on programme and the space programme?

Mr. Clarke: I thank my hon. Friend for his opening comments on research and development. We need to examine how we can use Government money most effectively in those areas. By and large, we seek to improve the climate so that industry itself can put more of its resources into research and development. Industry is likely to do that when projects are nearing the market place. That is why we are concentrating on collaborative research bringing together universities, higher education institutions and industry at an earlier stage.

On public procurement policy, we certainly look at the impact that we have on British industry and we shall continue to follow those policies. Today's White Paper includes the announcement of some further help for the information technology industry, although not in the previous Alvey form. The time has come to move on from that very successful policy. If my hon. Friend studies the White Paper, he will find that we have chosen objectives that will further collaborative research, bringing together partners who cannot be expected to come together without the stimulus of Government money. Other companies proceed on their own on the basis of what they h already derived from the Alvey initiative.

Our present commitment to the space programme the substantial expenditure that we incur on it continue and we shall remain full members of European Space Agency. So far, however, we h declined to take part in optional programmes in wh British participation would have been minimal and wh scientific and commercial advantage to this country not justify the expenditure proposed.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): Is the Mini aware that the abandonment of regional developm grants will be disastrous for industry in Scotland similar areas? Is he further aware that anyone who kn anything about regional policy will not believe for moment that his proposals can possibly maintain exis expenditure on the regions, even at its consider reduced level following Government cuts in recent ye Expenditure is bound to decrease and there is not a si figure in the White Paper to sustain the Minister's cl This is bad news for Scotland and for every other reg

Mr. Clarke: I hear what the right hon. Gentleman about regional policy, given that he has consider standing and experience in these matters. With respect is concentrating on the ending of one form of grant is failing to take on board the substantial new measu and the change in emphasis in our policies. The right h Gentleman's views are not shared by the Scottish Cou or the Scottish CBI, which supports our proposal. I only repeat that the sums in this White Paper substantially higher than those in the 1987 White Pa The figures do not anticipate a fall in expenditure over next three years—quite the reverse in the near term. debate on that can be continued more sensibly when White Paper is published shortly and the figures available.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Does right hon. and learned Friend accept that the move aw from excessive paternalism and automatic grants welcome and that his determination to achieve value money spent in the regions will be popular? Very people accept that we have had good value for money fr all that we have spent on the regions over the years. right hon. and learned Friend's determination to h small and medium size firms will be widely welcome particularly the toughening up of anti-competi practices laws, which most people accept have been v weak. Such firms need a fair market in which to oper successfully and, as my right hon. and learned Friend sa they will bring wealth and jobs to the regions.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's rema about automatic grants, and plainly I agree with them. hon. Friend is something of a specialist on small fir policy and I am grateful for his support of our moves offer consultancy services to small firms to improve th performance in key areas of business such as desi marketing and financial control.

I agree with my hon. Friend that the time has come overhaul the law on restrictive trade practices, which proving ineffective. No doubt in due course we shall he my hon. Friend's contribution on the Green Paper whi will contain proposals as to how we might make the present rules more effective to give better protection to small firms suffering from unfair practices.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Is it not clear that, without the regional policies pursued by every previous Government, unemployment in the regions would have been much higher than it is now? Is it not clear that all previous Governments have been presented with proposals for selective assistance but that for very practical reasons — some of them explained by Conservative Members—such proposals have been rejected? Is it not clear that the present proposals represent the abandonment of all previous Governments' regional policies, which will not help to solve the problem of unemployment in the regions in the long run? The proposals will have the opposite effect from that which the Government believe that they will have and the Government's policy will end in disaster for those in the regions.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman makes an extraordinarily broad-brush point in claiming that previous Governments have abandoned the principle of selective assistance altogether and always had automatic grants. Until now we have had both selective assistance and automatic grants and we now propose to end automatic grants and give greater emphasis to selective grants. Regional selective assistance has been with us for a long time; it is quite venerable. I am sure that if one examined the record of the previous Labour Government one would find that their regional selective assistance, combined with their selective assistance under section 8 of the Industry Act, amounted to a greater use of selectivity in grant giving than the present Government propose. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman's broad argument cannot be sustained.

Sir Raymond Gower (Vale of Glamorgan): Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that in Wales the cumulative effect of the changes could mean greater flexibility for the Secretary of State for Wales without the diminution of resources? Can he assure us that nothing in the proposed changes will handicap the Secretary of State or the Welsh Development Agency in assembling a package to attract companies from abroad?

Mr. Clarke: I can give my hon. Friend all those assurances quite straightforwardly. I am confident that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, too, will give those assurances emphatically and will act upon them.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): What are the implications of the proposals for changes in Government support for the regions for the operation of the European social fund and the European regional development fund? Under the proposals to change the assisted areas boundaries, will not some firms which qualify for fund support from Europe at present cease to qualify?

Mr. Clarke: I think that my statement made that clear, but the right hon. Gentleman may not have been able to hear me. We are not changing the boundaries of the assisted areas. One reason for that is that it is inevitably a protracted process involving consultation on either side of the border. Such a change also has to be cleared with the European Community because it has implications for European Community grants. When we embark on that process, it takes up to two and half years for the map to be fully reviewed. Therefore, entitlement grants will not be affected by the announce is being undertaken in the European Co moment to examine the future of the soci will settle matters, including the eligibility c next period of the fund.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): My learned Friend's statement contained n proposals, but is he aware that it is regre Government have not set under way a boundaries of assisted areas? For example, the Fylde, which lost its assisted area statu its access to the European regional develo 1984, now has an unemployment rate average for all the intermediate areas. Ha come to set such a review under way?

Mr. Clarke: My right hon. Friend advocate of the case for Blackpool regain area status that it had until three years reasons that I have just given, a full boundaries is not a straightforward proces It involves full consultation with all those w their status—whether in a development a to an intermediate area or an intermediate to any other area. Such a process must consent of the European Community.

For that reason, it was simply not fe embark on such a review comparatively so one, and certainly not since the last electio hon. and noble Friend and I have been at t We do not intend to embark on that, at le see how the new policies settle down.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): Do agree that some of the worst levels of une found not in the inner cities but in manufacturing towns and colliery villages areas such as the Rotherham and Mexbo work area which, according to the Gov fiddled figures, already has 20 per cent. o of work? The Minister has assured the H will not be a reduction in total Governm regional policy, but will he assure us that a cut in aid to any individual developme Rotherham and Mexborough?

Mr. Clarke: In future, our aid will be selective assistance to those firms that c that they need the grant to go ahead in s the new grant for small firms in developm the consultancy services and the busine initiatives that I have announced which, the quality of business throughout the U and especially in the assisted areas, beca a higher level of grant for that consultanc areas and in the urban programme areas

As I have said, our published plans fo increased expenditure compared with wha 1987. We intend to maintain the level regions. As some of the measures that I will depend very much on demand, on forward with applications for selective a small firms responding to the opportun presenting in the business initiatives, it i guarantee the level of spend in any partic planned expenditure is what we are aiming at. That is why we will market our policies so heavily to those who we believe will benefit from them. [Interruption.] I hope that the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) will restrain some of his hon. Friends from denouncing the fact that we spend money on letting the businesses in his constituency know what we have on offer.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on a sensible and imaginative package of changes to regional policy. Further to the point made by the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross), will my right hon. and learned Friend assure the House that under the revised system it will be possible for us to offer competitive financial packages to internationally mobile projects? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that a major factor influencing such decisions is the quality of suppliers and, therefore, his moves to improve that will not only enhance the performance of our regions but improve their attractiveness to inward investment?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments and agree that a key part of our policy is that Great Britain—Scotland, England and Wales—should be able to offer competitive packages of assistance to inward investors in the case of those genuinely mobile projects which, if we were unable to offer a package, might be tempted to France, Ireland or somewhere else. Therefore, we have made sure that that is retained in our package.

As my hon. Friend said, we do not attract investors to this country just by offering them good packages of grants. A growing level of inward investment comes to this country because of the general economic state of the country, the feeling that the quality of component suppliers and support industries is good and because industrial relations are better than they used to be. Our package will help to produce quality in small and medium size companies so that they will give the good quality components to Japanese, American and other businesses which will help to draw more of them here.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Given that the Secretary of State for Scotland, the Walter Mitty of Scottish politics, seems to believe that he is in charge of regional policy in Scotland, would it not have been diplomatic for the Minister to have allowed his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State to read even one sentence of the statement? Given that total regional spending in Scotland has fallen by more than half—from £525 million to £242 million—during the past 10 years, what credibility can we invest in assurances that the budget will not be squeezed further? Given that the Minister has selectively and disgracefully quoted the Scottish Council (Development and Industry), is he aware that that body has been among the most trenchant critics of the Government's dismantling of regional policy?

Mr. Clarke: If the hon. Gentleman, who represents the Scottish National party, is going to criticise the division of responsibilities between English and Scottish Ministers, with respect I advise him to discover what those responsibilities are now. The Department of Trade and Industry is and always has been the lead Department for regional policies. On the other hand, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has considerable devolved powers which he exercises through the Scottish Development Agency and other bod is no doubt that details of regional policy re responsibility and this policy does not change t

I have already given reassurances about the fi suggest only that the hon. Gentleman raises the s during the debate on the Autumn Statement and when he sees the White Paper on public spendi will confirm what I have said about spending in of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Robert Hicks (Cornwall, South-East): A welcome the retention of the Plymouth trave area as an assisted area, will my right hon. an Friend consider allowing that intermediate ar eligible for the business improvement services s view of the impending significant loss of jo Devonport dockyard? Will he elaborate on the cr can be described as being "identifiable and s benefits" for eligibility for the regional selective grant in the future?

Mr. Clarke: The existing business improveme is a European Community-inspired arrangement largely aimed at former steel, shipbuilding and ot It was a great success and was heavily over-subs some places. We have drawn extensively on our e of that in producing the domestic programme have announced today. Large parts of the busi enterprise initiative that I have announced, which support to small and medium size firms, are v drawn from the business improvement scheme. Friend's constituency will be one part of the cou will be eligible for the higher rate of grant companies that wish to have access to the initiative—[Interruption.] I shall not give in criteria for RSA now because if I do I shall be a filibustering by the hon. Member for Bolso Skinner).

We are not changing the essential criteri statutory basis for regional selective assistance shall put emphasis on additionality and making i provision for RSA because we believe that som who did not previously apply will apply now bec regional development grant is not available.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): Is the aware that Opposition Members remain deeply about the Government's commitment to retain amount of money that is given to regional a because the Government have already cut region £300 million, as the Minister has admitted, and, s because changing to aid on a selective basis en Government to cut by administrative fiat?

We have heard about the problems of the lar but there are also problems for smaller firms Minister aware that, despite his profession of Gov support for small firms, the abolition of automati will be a body blow to small firms because they have the knowhow or the time to apply for grants?

Mr. Clarke: I note the hon. Gentleman's sc about our commitment to the regions. I think th being over-cautious about a change in the natur support given to the regions. I do not know whe Labour party, which continually cites figures fro wishes to return to regional policy exactly as it wa return to increased spending on all projects regardless of cost per job limits. A huge amount of money went into Sullom Voe. That was a desirable investment, conducted by oil companies, at the edge of the Shetlands and employing only a few people permanently, but it was put there because oil was there. The Labour Government's regional policy made a major contribution to that investment to the great benefit of the oil companies but not of the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Small firms that are disadvantaged by applying for selective assistance are catered for in our White Paper to a considerable extent by the fact that the new grants that have been announced for the development areas will make it easy for firms with up to 25 employees to receive the grants that I announced for investment and innovation. The simplicity of the scheme aims, in part, at meeting the hon. Gentleman's point that it can sometimes be difficult for the smallest firms to go through the machinery of selective application.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the effect of his new regional policy will be to stem the migration of people from the assisted areas into high growth areas such as Cambridgeshire, where the pressures have become intolerable?

With regard to the welcome new initiative of linking small firms with the universities, will my right hon. and learned Friend please study the important initiatives of the company Cambridge Robotics, which have been referred to his Department and which are extremely interesting in this respect?

Mr. Clarke: For my own reasons, which coincide in part with those of my hon. Friend—I do not represent an East Anglian constituency, so our reasons are not wholly the same—I want a south to north flow of business and jobs, and therefore of people, if that reduces pressures on land prices, house values and planning applications in my hon. Friend's part of the country and in many others. To do that, we must encourage the continued growth of the northern economy and strengthen its quality of management, to ensure that the north performs at the best levels of marketing, quality, design and the other things that I have already mentioned. I trust that this policy will have the effect that my hon. Friend wants.

I shall certainly examine the case that my hon. Friend cited as an example of good links between industry and the universities. Cambridge science park and most things around Cambridge university are excellent examples of how British universities can catch up with the American practice of forging such links.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): Does the Minister agree that anyone with £100,000 to invest three or four years ago would have been better off buying a house in London, watching its value double, and getting a tax incentive to do so? Why do the farmers in the fat south receive protection and subsidies, and the defence industries get handouts; yet when it comes to northern industries, all they get is a dab of lipstick on the face and their crutches kicked away?

Mr. Clarke: The answer could lie in the late 1970s, when northern and midlands industries found that they were surviving on nothing but a diet subsidies and handouts. That did not turn o and I do not think that that was an alter which we are likely to return.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with part of the h analysis of the differences between the south. It is true, in economic and employ the north still does not have a high enou people working in small and medium si that the start-up rate of small busine adequate in the north. There is a need to small and medium size industry that i excellent standards of management of all strong to survive and not only a bran successful staff. All the policies that I today are aimed in that direction.

Larger industries will also benefit. Th subsidies as much, and they do not ne support. They have spare management capacity to look after their own marketing, design and exporting, but the climate is made more attractive for large firms if there is a good network of high-quality component suppliers. That, as my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) said a moment ago, is what we are trying to develop in Scotland. I do not think that coal owners are likely to return to school governing boards.

As far as the loss of jobs in the hon. Gentleman's constituency is concerned, the continued success of the British economy, our ability to stimulate the creation of more small companies, to strengthen small companies that already exist and to carry on building on the success of the enterprise economy that we have already achieved is the best hope for those facing economic changes in his constituency.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that one of the great achievements of the Government has been the reduction —indeed, the virtual removal—of restrictive practices in the unions and the skullduggery associated with them? Can he confirm that his proposed measures will have the same effect in the City? If so, will he confirm that the effect in Scotland will be to the benefit of Scottish-based companies?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend that the improved climate of industrial relations and the fact that we now have the lowest number of strikes for 50 years have been important elements in the revival of the British economy. I agree that restrictive practices are undesirable anywhere. We have tackled them in the trade unions and in the City with strong regulatory measures, but restrictive practices between large firms in the market place need to be tackled. That is why our Green Paper would ensure that genuinely competitive conditions were maintained, and I look forward to my hon. Friend's contribution to the consultations on it.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Does the Minister agree that the reasons the Government gave for not redefining the boundaries of assisted areas were ill-conceived when one considers that the boundaries were fixed only in 1984? Does he realise that, since that time, in areas such as my Castleford travel-to-work area the mining industry has been wiped out with no assistance given? Will he tell the House what assistance there is in the Green Paper for areas such as that, or will Government policy continue to victimise miners and mining communities? Is it not time such victimisation stopped?

Mr. Clarke: I realise that one of the problems with having a map of any kind for regional policy is that there are always difficulties with boundaries. However, a map is essential for a regional policy, so the boundaries must be reviewed from time to time. That is a long and difficult process, involving an examination of the status of each area.

Such status must be cleared with the EEC and should not be embarked upon too readily. It might be regarded as completely fair to keep moving some travel-to-work areas in, and others out, year in year out, but it would create great uncertainty and diminish the effect of the grants that we offer to attract people to these areas.

I can offer a continuation and strengthening of present policy to areas that do not have assisted area status, and what I have announced by way of the business and the strengthening of small firms will make contribution to them.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-We right hon. and learned Friend aware that tow King's Lynn in my constituency, and other towns in Norfolk, such as Norwich and Great have consistently suffered as a result of distorti by regional policy? Mr. Clarke: There is a downside to regional p of the points of the policy is to attract industry of low unemployment to areas of high unemp do not think I can offer my hon. Scotland and Wales and where the arguments are exactly the same, that the lead Department makes the statement. Of course, it would be possible for my statement to be followed by a statement by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, followed by Scottish questioners, and for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales to make a statement, followed by Welsh questioners. We would all be talking about the same thing. My right hon. Friends prefer to remain within the mainstream of United Kingdom politics and I believe that they are right to do so.

With regard to regional policy within the EEC, we are taking considerable advantage of the social and regional funds. We are engaged in discussions with our partners in the EEC at the moment. We support the continuation of regional policy, but we must ensure that we get our fair share of the funds available and that they are used to good purpose in this country—that remains our main aim.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that regional aids and industrial development certificates did Birmingham much more harm than good? The new Government scheme has much to recommend it. However, will my right hon. and learned Friend deal in more detail with two important points. Under the present system the Ministry acts as godfather. Under the new system it will act as God. The people involved in my right hon. and learned Friend's Department — wonderful though they are — have precious little industrial experience. Therefore, they will need to call upon outside people for advice and many of those people will be heavily involved in the economy of their own areas. How will we avoid a feeling of "jobs for the boys"? How will we sort things out so that this scheme will be run properly and fairly and the money will be spent in the right areas?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend's first point. When Labour was in office it acted so that people could not invest in Birmingham and it refused industrial development certificates in the fond belief that that would be benefiting the United Kingdom economy and would drive people north. We have put an end to that and other things.

We are not changing the way in which regional selective assistance is operated. As I explained to my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), we shall continue to depend to a great extent on outside industrialists when appraising selective assistance applications. However, an important point touched upon by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) relates to the business initiative and the provision of consultancies, with 50 per cent. support from the Government, which I have already described. Those business initiatives will be organised and delivered entirely by the private sector. We shall provide the funds, but we shall use contractors to organise the schemes. For example, in the case of design we will use the Design Council and in the case of marketing we will use the Institute of Marketing. The consultants used will be private sector consultants, vetted by those bodies for their effectiveness, and we shall merely contribute to the cost of private sector managers helping other private sector managers to improve the quality of performance in their particular business.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that there is a repeated inconsistency in much of what he has said. Let us take a simple example in the St. Helens area. Recently, the Minister's colleague permitted the Warrington urban development corporation to develop 586 acres of Burtonwood, on the edge of St. Helens. St. Helens has an extremely high unemployment rate and yet it is not given any development grant. Am I to understand that St. Helens will get preferential treatment when it comes begging for loans to relieve our unemployment rate? Perhaps, at the same time, the Minister could give an assurance that whoever mans the Manchester office, with responsibility to his Department, will learn to pay the grants on time rather than deluge the small businesses in St. Helens with considerable numbers of forms. When those forms have been sent back that office still wants more information. Does the Minister accept that that practice needs looking at?

Mr. Clarke: I believe that I am correct in saying that St. Helens is an intermediate area. The abolition of regional development grant will have no adverse consequences on the right projects. As an assisted area it will be eligible for the higher rate of grant under the business initiative. I trust that many firms in St. Helens will take advantage of the various initiatives that we shall be promoting through the medium of television, as well as by other means, during the next few weeks. To some extent, therefore, that preferential treatment for St. Helens will help the local economy.

I take note of the hon. Gentleman's points about bureaucracy in our regional offices. We are extending our regional network and creating more regional offices to be close to the businesses concerned, which should help, but we shall certainly continue to ensure that, as in 99 per cent. of the cases, we operate our schemes with minimum bureaucracy and maximum speed.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that for many years the chorus from a multitude of smaller companies throughout the country has been that they are simply unaware of what the DTI has on offer? Will he therefore step up the communications effort, not only from the centre but from his regional offices, so that more and more companies are aware of the opportunities?

Mr. Clarke: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. There have been a large number of programmes in the DTI over the years and some have remained a well-kept secret from the outside world. We therefore intend heavily on the programmes identified i initiative. We shall be marketing them ensure that small and medium-sized bus managers are aware of what the Gove offer. I hope that my hon. Friend's sensi listened to carefully by a few people on Front Bench who will no doubt start to c as we let the public know about the designed to help them, through television

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet. names of those hon. Members and I preference on later occasions. Now I sh point of the hon. Member for Bolsover (

It is also worth noting tha were Privy Councillors who had their lit they went. I think you ought to bear that i you call people for questions. Some of us end.

Points of Order

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Following yesterday's outrageous events in the Chamber, perhaps you heard on the radio yesterday afternoon the hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Hughes) saying that, although he had been suspended from the House, he intended to repeat the incident as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is strictly hypothetical.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order has nothing to do with the statement or today's questions. I shall raise it now. I gave notice to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton), that I was going to raise this point of order because it concerns him. In raising this point of order, I want to make it clear that I cast no aspersions whatsoever on his integrity. I have the highest regard and the greatest respect for him, but last night, in his winding-up speech, he declared an interest in a company. I raised the matter briefly on a point of order. The Minister has an interest in a company called Hamilton and Kinneil Estates Ltd. There is no doubt that that company and other similar companies would benefit when the legislation debated yesterday is enacted. It is unprecedented for a Government Minister to be responsible for legislation——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I heard what the hon. Gentleman said last night. It is not a matter for me; it is a matter for the Select Committee on Members' Interests and for the Committee of Selection.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): It is a ministerial rule.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not responsible for the ministerial rules. The hon. Gentleman should address his comments to the Select Committee on Members' Interests.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a different point of order, Mr. Speaker. As I am sure you are aware, you are held in deep respect by the House, but the House is also of the opinion that, on some occasions, you have a very difficult job to do. Many hon. Members, particularly on the Conservative side of the House, would like to help you in the execution of your duties. With that in mind, I am putting to you this point of order, and am seeking your advice.

Yesterday, an hon. Member—I believe that he is an hon. Member of this House, although, like most other hon. Members, I have never clapped eyes on him before—contrived to get himself suspended from the sitting of the House. It seems that there is a growing band of imitators of that venerated eccentric, the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)——

Mr. Speaker: Order. What can possibly be the point of order for me? The hon. Gentleman started by saying that he would like to be helpful. He is now being most unhelpful.

Mr. Marlow: I am coming to the helpful point. It appears that it is possible for hon. Members to see themselves as martyrs without even having to pay for a box of matches to set the conflagration alight. If hon. Members who were suspended lost their pay——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We cannot go back to what was done yesterday. I say to the hon. Gentleman and to the whole House that I do have a difficult task. It would help me and the whole House enormously if hon. Members stuck strictly to the rules and conventions of this House.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Reverting to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing), about a Minister declaring an interest, could I draw your attention to the fact that some time ago I sought permission to place in the Library of the House the rules of procedure for Ministers. They state clearly that Ministers with departmental responsibilities must divest themselves of their financial interest in companies which would benefit from their administration.

At the time, you ruled that it was not in order for that document to be placed in the Library, but I draw the matter to your attention because, with great respect, it is not a matter for the Select Committee on Members' Interests. Under those rules, the Minister quite properly declared an interest. What is at issue is whether the Minister, in having an interest, is in breach of regulations laid down by the Crown through the Prime Minister in respect of the duty of Ministers to Parliament. Would you therefore look back at my earlier submission and consider whether that document, which every Minister receives, ought to be made available to the House so that hon. Members know the rules that govern Ministers in the conduct of financial business in which they have an interest?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall certainly do what the right hon. Gentleman said.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): There are nine of them.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall certainly do what the right hon. Gentleman has suggested, but I am not responsible for the ministerial rules. They certainly exist and the matter should be taken up with those who are concerned with them.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Just before Christmas, you had the misfortune, in some ways, to apologise to me and I readily accepted that apology. Today I want to apologise to you because I do not feel that it is good for Parliament if hon. Members shout out from sedentary positions, as I did. In that spirit, could you please do something about the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thank the hon. Gentleman and can only say that what went on between us was misrepresented in some quarters. Shouted interjections across the Chamber, from whichever side, do not help our proceedings and I hope that, during the remainder of this Session, and of this Parliament, we may continue along the parliamentary lines of good behaviour.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I welcome what you said in reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). I crave your assistance because the Committee of Selection will be meeting on the Housing (Scotland) Bill and, due to the lack of Tory Members from Scotland, it is probably inevitable that the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) will be a member of the Committee, or will be nominated. I ask for your assurance that no selection will be made for the Committee until you have made a pronouncement on this vexatious matter.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me. I am not responsible for the Committee of Selection, but I am sure that what the hon. Gentleman has just said will have been heard by the Patronage Secretary.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford) rose——

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry I did not call the hon. Member to put a question on the statement.

Mr. Wells: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. May I remind you of your words about the frustration of sitting on the Back Benches of Parliament, particularly in this Parliament, and bring to your attention the fact that the frustration could have been mollified a little if hon. Members representing constituencies which paid regional development grants and other imposts had been permitted to take part in the debate on the trade and industry statement made today?

Mr. Speaker: Again I say to the hon. Member that I know it is a life of great frustration on the Back Benches, but what may be a disappointment one day could perhaps be a happiness on another.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you accept that an hon. Member who has broken the rules and has paid the penalty by being suspended should nevertheless have his reputation defended? Will you accept that my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Hughes) yesterday acted from the highest motives? Is it relevant, in view of some of the remarks that have been made, for the point to be understood that my hon. Friend was concerned about an eight-month-old child who desperately requires open heart surgery?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is unfair. I have no idea what motives are in the minds of Members when they speak. I regret what happened yesterday. I accept, as the hon. Member has just said, that ours is a life of very great frustration, and frustration takes all kinds of forms.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Something that you said earlier may be misinterpreted. You said, when my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) raised the issue of the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton), serving on the Committee to consider the Housing (Scotland) Bill, that that was not your responsibility. I cast no aspersions, but are you sure that, in that you are responsible for the conduct of the House, you are not concerned as to whether the Committee of Selection chooses people who, very honourably, as in the case of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West, have declared an interest? Furthermore, should the Crown rules on the conduct of Ministers be made available? The Crown rules have not yet been put in the Library. Should not you, as the Speaker, responsible for the conduct of the House, insist that those rules are put in the Library so that we can know where we are in relation to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West who is a Government Minister responsible for highly controversial legislation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand the point that has been made. It is not for the Chair to dictate to the Select Committee who should be appointed. I say again that what has been said will undoubtedly have been heard on the Government Front Bench.

Mr. Skinner rose——

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is a regular attender here and is called regularly, but it is unfair for him to seek, under the cloak of a point of order, to achieve an answer to a question that he would have wished to put to the Minister. If it is a matter for me, I will deal with it.

Mr. Skinner: If we can clear up the misunderstanding that occurred earlier, Mr. Speaker, I was trying to point out to you that at the end of the day it is a matter for you as to whether parliamentary questions can be laid in the Table Office. That was the point I was trying to establish.

I want to draw to the attention of you and the House that we shall have a new set of rules on grants being made regionally and selectively. If we take a line through the nationalised industries, Ministers are not responsible for day-to-day administration. However, it was possible for any Member of Parliament to put down a question on grants that were obtainable or otherwise in his or her constituency, which would be accepted by the Table Office and the Minister would be responsible. But it is not the same with the day-to-day administration of nationalised industries.

I want to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, what may arise out of the changes in the Minister's statement and ask whether it will still be the same. Will hon. Members be able to ask, by a parliamentary question or otherwise, whether some consultancy in their area has obtained a grant or failed to obtain a grant? Will the element of day-to-day administration apply in this case as it does in nationalised industries, or will we have a free run? Many of my hon. Friends fear that the abandonment of the financial guidelines will mean a period of graft, corruption and backhanders.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member will have heard, as the whole House heard, that a Bill will be presented today. I have no knowledge of what is in the Bill, but I have no doubt that the matter raised by the hon. Member will be relevant to the debate on it.

BILL PRESENTED

Mr. Kenneth Clarke, supported by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Walker, Mr. Secretary Ridley, Mr. Secretary Rifkind and Mr. Robert Atkins, presented a Bill to preclude the making of grants under Part II of the Industrial Development Act 1982 after 31 March 1988 unless previously applied for and to restrict payment of such grants in certain cases; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 78.]

Post Office Exclusive Privilege (Extinction) Bill

5.6 pm

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to extinguish the Post Office exclusive privilege of conveying letters.

I am not seeking to privatise the Post Office, although that may be no bad thing. I am not seeking to limit or control it. I merely want to see alternative letter deliveries permitted. The Post Office will not lose a single postman or pillar box—all I am asking for is competition. If confession is good for the soul, competition is good for industry.

We should look at what happened when we removed British Telecom's monopoly on the production of telephones. Five years ago we were all using standard telephones, which we stirred up with a finger, however arthritic the finger or however difficult it was for elderly people. Today we are on the brink of having pocket-size, portable, push-button telephones for everyone. That is the kind of magic which competition achieves in industry. It refreshes the parts which monopolies and Socialism do not reach.

The refreshing quality of the Government is their willingness to tackle some of the antique institutions of our economy. The monuments to Herbert Morrison's ghost — the old nationalised industries — are all being modernised and given a shake up. Surely a privilege which was granted by Charles II in the 1660s should not survive into the 1990s.

It is a happy chance that today Lord Young has chosen to define in his White Paper the new focus of his Department's activities for the rest of the Parliament. Paramount among those is to encourage competition and to tackle restrictive practices. I can think of no better or more appropriate starting point than the Post Office. We all know that it is hopelessly flawed.

We are all fond of our local postman who struggles through all kinds of weather and past the dogs to get the letters to our letter boxes, but behind him or her in the sorting office all the old Micky Mouse restrictive practices are going on—the practices which practically brought Fleet street to its knees. That is why our first-class letter post has deteriorated so badly and why we have to endure the annual Christmas threat of a Post Office strike. I am sure that the Post Office management would welcome competition, because it would help to bring its own unruly labour force into line.

A doubt expressed to me on this subject is that if we allowed competition into delivery of letters, urban Britain would get quick and cheap postal services while rural areas and offshore islands would lose out. Let me assure the House that that theory is completely without foundation. The private sector delivers milk and newspapers to the most remote corners of our country without the need for monopoly milkmen or paperboys. Nor do we need to worry about the cost of delivering those letters. The cost of a bar of chocolate is exactly the same in the Orkneys as it is in Orpington. In other words, when the private sector is in charge it is not worth the trouble to make an exception and to charge more for long distances.

Another doubt that is raised is whether the existing commercial delivery services, such as TNT and Postplan plc, are interested in delivering letters. That really does not matter. I do not know whether they are or not. When th was a strike in the Post Office in 1971, within a few d 562 contractors up and down the country had applied licences to deliver letters. With even more remarka speed they formed a network that they called association of mail services, and they covered the wh country. That happened despite the fact that competit had been suppressed for more than 300 years.

I believe that the Government have the power under Post Office Act 1969 to suspend the Post Office monop or reduce the minimum charge currently imposed by from £1 to say 5p. No special legislation is needed to that.

All hon. Members are in the House as a result o competitive process. Democracy involves alternatives, all hon. Members nominally support the right of the pu to political choice. A monopoly such as the Post Offic an exclusive privilege to supply a service with competition and is therefore undemocratic.

If the Labour party is opposed to deregulation of post, is it also opposed to competition in other areas wh we take competition for granted? Would it approve o state monopoly in the provision of shoes, trous biscuits, cars or other types of service? The Socialists not dare to reveal their true colours on this issue beca if they did, they would face public ridicule and electo humiliation. Instead, they seek to defend the remain pockets of monopoly trades union privilege on the ord of their trades union paymasters. That is the only poss reason for opposing my Bill.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): In oppos the Bill, I wish to begin by placing on record my tha for the help that has been given to me by my comrade, hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewi and to say at the outset that we intend to divide the Ho I also thank my right hon. Friend the Member Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), a former Postmaster-General, his assistance.

The Post Office letter monopoly has existed for alm 400 years. Recently it was confirmed in Telecommunications Act 1984, which set a lower limi £1 per letter on the charge for private delivery. operation of a national planned and co-ordinated ser with universal rates of delivery has made British po services the envy of the world. That was admitted by Institute of Economic Affairs, one of the organisati which briefed the hon. Member for Billericay (M Gorman). That is a Right-wing body, which rece confirmed that the Post Office comes out well international comparison.

The Post Office has been profitable for at least 10 ye It has contributed £400 million to the Treasury during period and its after-tax profits to April 1987 were £ million, not least because of the work and effort put in postal workers throughout the country, as a result which productivity has risen by 20 per cent. over the five years. That is why the fat cats in the City of Lon and the so-called learned institutes such as IEA and Adam Smith Institute are awaiting with glee the picki from the next round of the Prime Minister's sale of century, which is being trailed today by the hon. Mem for Billericay.

A year ago, the Right-wing Centre for Policy Stu advocated the phased privatisation of the Post Of Since then, the Post Office has been split and reorgani into four separate businesses, resulting in managers being bigger fish in smaller ponds. The eyes of the Right are firmly on Girobank and the counter services, not only because those businesses are worth £86,000 million, but because the counter services occupy valuable and profitable high street sites in every town and city in the country.

Despite the Prime Minister's election promises that the royal mail was safe from privatisation, the pressure is clearly building up from the Right wing, and it will have to be met by a national campaign by postal workers, supported by other trade unionists inside and outside the industry, to defend our publicly-owned service from the privateers and the vultures of the Right of society.

The Post Office has 100,000 letter boxes, 28,000 vans, and 45,000 delivery staff on our streets every morning. In the few days before Christmas they delivered 100 million items each day, which is more than twice as much as all its competitors deliver in a year. There has been an enormous growth in the past five years in the delivery of mail — about 25 per cent. since 1982. Sir Bryan Nicholson predicts a further 6·5 per cent. growth in this financial year. The fact that there were 91 strikes between April and November last year is the result of continued attacks by management on all aspects of the working conditions of postal staff. In my view, and in the view of other London Members, postal staff were justified in campaigning before Christmas for a reduction in their 43-hour working week; it was done not only for their own benefit but to increase the number of full-time staff, to reduce the number of casual staff and to make a dent in the horrific levels of mass unemployment that we have had in the past nine years under a Tory Government.

The Bill is about lifting the letter monopoly. It would have dramatic effects on rural communities. In my view —I suspect it is the view of most hon. Members—mail is a social service, especially in this era of divided and elderly families. Servicing rural areas, particularly the outlying areas, is inherently unprofitable at 18p a letter. The present inter-city traffic subsidises letters between smaller towns and villages and outlying areas to the tune of £130 million a year which is the cost of subsidisation; that is 6 per cent. of the turnover of the royal mail. If the letter monopoly went, the universal post and stamp would inevitably go. Letters to people living outside cities would cost as much as three or four times the present rate. The 75p letter could become a reality. The Tories prate on about the supposed benefits of competitive pressures. Those pressures would inevitably force the abandonment of door-to-door delivery for all areas and the introduction of collection boxes in small towns, and villages, and on the high streets. The cities would not be immune either. Even in central London, without the Post Office letter monopoly, the level of competition facing the Post Office would mean that it would need the same number of offices and delivery staff to provide its services. But if the volume of traffic went down, the pressure would force charges to rise.

The gainers would be the Rupert Murdochs of this world, with his firm TNT. They wait like vultures for the pickings of big business and the big City trade. The losers would be the millions who do not live in urban areas, and the thousands of postal workers, whose jobs would be put in jeopardy.

The hon. Member for Billericay says that rural postal services would not suffer. But higher postal charges for those living outside the big cities would act like an additional local tax. The Right wing that supports the arguments of the hon. Member for Billericay, such as the Institute of Economic Affairs, argues that people living in rural areas should not expect to have better treatment than those who live in cities. It says that people choose whether to live in rural areas, with long drives to their doors, or to live in accessible urban blocks of flats. Some commuters who live 20 or 30 miles from London may take that decision. I thought until today that the Tory argument was in favour of the preservation of rural communities, and not only because most of their seats are in those areas. The pressure that will be put on those who do not live in rural areas by choice but were born and brought up there will be the responsibility of those who vote for the Bill.

According to The Economist, courier services are springing up in London like weeds. There is Postplan, Link Up, Business Post Ltd. and Metro Associates. In November I drew to the attention of the House the fact that there is now one in Coventry called Coventry Couriers. On 10 November I asked for a statement from the Department of Trade and Industry. I have waited in deafening silence for that statement. Coventry Couriers is a cowboy business which charges 10p an item, breaking the 1981 legal monopoly under which such letters should not be delivered for a charge of less than £1 per item. The firm charges £1 but offers a 90 per cent. discount if people pay their bills straightaway. It is operating under that margin of legality under this so-called law and order Government.

I have here some letters delivered by that firm. One about immunisation was delivered to my two-year-old daughter, Charlotte, from the area health authority in Coventry on 12 December. I have letters from various local firms such as estate agents and stationers. The franking is designed to look exactly like Post Office franking so as to give a veneer of respectability to the service. That firm is living like a leech off the pressure on the area health authority to cut its costs because of the £1·5 million cut in its budget.

If this is a Government of law and order, what action is the Department of Trade and Industry taking about these illegal operations? Why have there not been prosecutions? Why does the DTI not stop these people breaking the Tories' own rules? The Tories seem to have a pathological hatred of publicly-owned industries. They denigrate them. Then, after privatisation—and it takes a warped imagination to come out with such a phrase—we are all expected to believe that BT is now magic; those were the words of the hon. Member for Billericay.

The Tories feed on the fact that nationalised industries in the last 40 years were saddled with debts and lavish compensation payments. Because all the old managers were still in charge, the miners said in the late '40s, "We are a new broom with old bristles." Nationalised industries may be state owned, but they are still managed by people who are inherently against public ownership. I believe that Sir Bryan Nicholson falls into that category. Such people are not there to defend publicly owned industries and to extend them but to prepare them for privatisation. Those industries have failed in private hands, as we saw in the case of power, coal, steel and transport. Yet we, the taxpayers and the working people, are being saddled with their debts and compensation payments.

There is an alternative. We could restore the image of nationalised industries and give credence to our forefathers and mothers who campaigned in the Labour movement for public ownership by having genuine public ownership. Those who work in the Post Office and in other nationalised industries, together with the trade union movement representing the wider population and the Government, should organise the industries on a tripartite basis to provide not for the pirates and the privateers whom the hon. Member for Billericay represents, but for the whole population, including the rural communities which my hon. Friends and I represent. I urge the House to reject the Bill.

Orders of the Day

Social Security Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 5

UP-RATING ORDERS

'(1) It is hereby declared that the orders to which section applies were validly made and that the Secretary State is under no duty to revoke them.

(2) The orders to which this section applies are—

(a) the Social Security Benefits Up-rating (No. 2) O 1987;

(b) the Occupational Pensions (Revaluation) O 1987.'—[Mr. Scott.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

5.34 pm

The Minister for Social Security and the Disabled (Nicholas Scott): I beg to move, That the clause be rea Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With th will be convenient to consider Government amendm Nos. 19 to 21.

Mr. Scott: The amendments are consequential on new clause.

The House knows that the error in the calculatio the retail price index has had an effect on the level social security benefits. Indeed, in the statement th made to the House on 18 December I set out our plan special payments and we are pressing ahead with t arrangements. I made clear our full recognition of moral obligation in the matter and that we were d something about it, but the House has recognised tha were not bound legally to make these payments, and we acted in good faith in basing the benefit rate payment on the RPI as published.

Nevertheless, we believe that it is desirable to intro an amendment to the Bill to put beyond doubt the vali of the levels set out in the uprating order which will c into effect in April. That will be the effect of the clause, and it is because we want to do it at the ear opportunity that we are introducing it on Report.

Similar considerations apply to the Occupati Pensions (Revaluation) Order, which likewise require increase in line with prices.

I believe that the reasons for the new clause are understood and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 1

INDEXING OF CHILD BENEFIT

'In section 63(3) of the Social Security Act 1986, fo (d)" there shall be substituted", (d) or (f)".'—[Mr. Cook.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): I beg to move, That clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenie consider new clause 4—Uprating of Child Benefit—

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

'In paragraph (b) of subsection (3) of Section 63 of the Social Security Act 1986 leave out:—

"*(c)*or (d) above" and insert:—

"(c), (d) or, in any Order having effect on or after 10th April 1989, (f), (child benefit), above.".'.

Mr. Cook: The effect of the new clause may not be immediately apparent, but I am advised that it will correctly give effect to our intention, which is to include child benefit among those benefits which are automatically index-linked under the 1986 Act and to prevent it from suffering the fate of benefits that are not automatically index-linked, such as the death grant, which was allowed to wither until it was of such insignificance that the Government were able to move in and kill it off.

The hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) has tabled the similar new clause 4. I note that the hon. Gentleman has been heavily briefing the press that our new clause would take immediate effect whereas his would not take effect until next year. I would not be unhappy if my new clause had the effect of forcing an increase in child benefit this April, but I would be somewhat surprised if it had that effect since we have already passed the Up-rating (No. 2) Order, which gives effect to increases this April. I rather suspect that the effect of the hon. Gentleman's new clause and mine would be identical, although the wording may be different.

For the avoidance of doubt, I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall be voting for both new clauses and, as they both achieve identical objectives, it would be strange to differentiate between them. I appreciate that some Conservative Members may, for political reasons, wish to vote for his new clause rather than mine. I only urge them all to agree to vote for the same one, to maintain voting strength.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to interrupt him so early in his speech. I felt that it might help the House if I were to explain. I was advised that if the remaining stages of this Bill were completed quickly and his new clause were adopted, it would be possible for the uprating called for to be implemented in time for the coming April. So there would be a difference in meaning between my new clause 4 and his new clause 1, in the unlikely event that the Bill completed all its stages within, say, the next three or four weeks.

Mr. Cook: I should regard such an outcome as delightful, but perhaps I could put it to the Minister that we are willing to compromise on this point and if that is what would oblige him to resist our new clause, I am willing to come or go with him about April.

Our new clause is prompted by the recent history of child benefit which twice in the past three years has not been uprated in line with inflation. As a result, mothers in Britain now lose £30 per child per year that they would have received had the benefit been uprated to its value in 1979. The sum of £30 is significant to a mother operating on a tight budget; it is the equivalent of a good winter coat or two new pairs of shoes. It would be sufficient to keep a child well shod throughout the year.

If that is not bad enough, it is clear that the new Secretary of State for Social Services has what can only be described as a vigorous distaste for child benefit which he has hinted at on a number of occasions. In reply to a number of my hon. Friends in November, he assu that child benefit under this Government would "under constant review", which many people ou House and some Opposition Members not unre interpreted as meaning that child benefit would constant threat.

That statement has been made by the Governm the election. It contrasts markedly with stateme by the Conservative party at election time. It possible to fill a slim dictionary of quotati expressions of support for child benefit by Co Members around polling day. Those quotations the statement by the Prime Minister in 1979, whe that the Conservatives were impatient to imple child benefit system, to the statement by the curr Secretary to the Treasury when he was the M State, Department of Health and Social Security during the last general election that child bene continue as a non-means-tested universal paymen the mother and tax-free. He said that there ough question about that.

It is my objective to maximise cross-party su child benefit. I will, therefore, spare the House m about that commitment being consigned to oubliette Central Office maintains for manifesto ments. Instead, I want to undertake the perhaps duty for an Opposition Member of urging Co Members to recognise that their manifesto was c to stick with it.

I begin that task by reminding those Mem child benefit replaced a tax allowance. It may to like child benefit if they think of it as a tax a Had it remained a tax allowance, it would almos have done better under this Government than i cash benefit. Personal tax allowances have gone this Government by some 15 per cent. By co child benefit has gone down by 3 per cent. Th strikingly odd result that the tax allowance to man, which is supposed to assist him with th maintaining a wife, has increased in real value cash benefit offered to him towards the cost of m his children has gone down.

5.45 pm

Most critics of child benefit persist in misunde it. They treat it solely as a means of helping the the main function of child benefit is to redistri not from the rich to the poor, but from the c families with children, and that is an objective nearly every civilised country has some mecha only do they all provide help with the cost of chi overwhelmingly, the countries of western Euro more help than we do.

The income figures for households with chil how right those countries are. Two thirds of h with children have an average income below th average; two thirds of households without chi an average income above the national avera figures demonstrate what we all know from experience, which is that the period of raising a period of double pressure, when households fa income and at the same time higher costs.

That brings me to the second reason why I b Conservative Members should wish to mainta value of child benefit. I note that the buzz w Administration in social security is "targ targeting is the criterion by which we are to judge child benefit, we are obliged to award it an alpha plus. If the objective is to help with the costs of children, child benefit hits 100 per cent. of its targets. Its take-up is absolute; it is simple; it is easy to understand; and it is well known. It is a universal benefit and there is, therefore, no stigma in claiming it. Collecting it can be done with dignity because it is part of one entitlement as a citizen.

Better still, the benefit goes to the mother and, in practice, it is the mother who still, in nine cases out of ten, pays for the grocery basket. It is interesting that a survey by the Child Poverty Action Group discovered that 95 per cent. of mothers claiming child benefit said that they at least sometimes used that benefit to pay for children's clothing. One is six said that they always used it to pay for clothing. It is clear that those mothers were using child benefit as the means by which they ensured that their children were decently clad. For women unable to work because they have young children, child benefit provides the only income that they can call their own and on which they can depend weekly.

This is one of the occasions when the decision of the House may be affected by the lopsided male bias in our representation in the Chamber. If the composition of the Chamber remotely approached a fair representation of the proportion of women in our society, I do not believe that there would be a hope of our tolerating the freezing of child benefit.

So far, I have argued that it is important to maintain child benefit because it redistributes income from the childless to families with children and because, within households with children, it redistributes spending power from the male to the mother. But it is also important in helping families out of the poverty trap, and it may be worth recalling that the benefit was brought in to replace a tax allowance precisely because a cash benefit gives greater help to low-income families who may often be too poor to pay tax. Even today, 1·3 million families in receipt of child benefit pay no income tax. For them, the introduction of child benefit was a progressive measure which has given them help that they would otherwise not have received.

There is another subsidiary role of child benefit in helping families out of poverty. The aspect that makes it possible to help families out of poverty is precisely that feature which its critics most object to. It is a flat-rate benefit which is not means-tested and so it does not penalise the families whose father betters himself by getting that bit extra in income. The Government appear determined to push more and more families on to means-tested benefits. The decision to freeze child benefit last November makes another 15,000 households liable to means-tested benfits by leaving them with an income below the entitlement level of means-tested benefits.

The problem is not only that we are ending up with more households on means-tested benefits, but that, at the same time, the Government are sharply accelerating the rate at which those means-tested benefits taper off. Thus, housing benefit, as from next April, will taper off at the rate of 85p for every additional pound in net income. The new family credit will taper off at 70p for every additional pound in income. Many families, as a result, will end up with a marginal rate of taxation of 90 per cent. — a higher rate than is paid by the wealthiest family in the land, but which on this occasion will be met by some of the poorest households in the land.

Child benefit is one of the last surviving wa softening that ferocious marginal rate of taxation, gives families an incentive to struggle out of the p trap. Its value is dramatically illustrated if we cons family of four in which both parents are out of While child benefit exists, one of those parents ne obtain a job with a wage of only £130 a week to lea family 10 per cent. better off than they are whil parent is unemployed. If child benefit were not the parent would need to land a job paying £190 a w achieve the same effect. That is a difference of appreciate that there is at present no proposal to r child benefit in its entirety, but the longer that child b is frozen, the higher the parent must jump in starting to escape the poverty trap.

That is an argument which weighs with Oppo Members. I am bound to say, however, that it ou weigh all the more heavily with Conservative Me who belong to a party which readily talks the langu incentives, independence and self-reliance. If the sincere in seeking to achieve a society that represents values, they ought to cherish child benefit, rathe allowing its value to decline in relation to means- benefits.

Most hon. Members will have received a briefing the organisation "Save Child Benefit", and I am sur they have diligently read the text of that memora However, in case they omitted to do so, I invite th look at the last page, which lists the 50 members of Child Benefit". It is an exalted collection of memb the poverty lobby and the women's movement includes some remarkable establishment names, su the Church of England Children's Society, the M Union, the National Federation of Women's Inst the Royal Scottish Society for Prevention of Cru Children and the Salvation Army.

Those are not front organisations for the L movement. I am not aware that we are affiliated Mothers Union, or that it is affiliated to our consti parties. That is not the radical end, the extremist fri the feminist movement, but the establishment i women's movement. It is, in a sense, rooted i backyards of Conservative Members, and my new is rooted in their own history.

Leafing through past debates on the issue which s back for more than a decade, I was delighted to not when child benefit was introduced in 1975 Conservative party tabled an amendment to th seeking to provide for the regular indexing of child b with inflation. Indeed, the amendment was moved Minister of Trade and Industry, who has just announcing to the House the abolition of a large p his Department's function. His amendment was militant than mine: it attempted to provide for inde of child benefit every six months, and I cheerfully co to the Minister that that goes rather further than prepared to go.

My new clause is more modest and moderate, and only an annual uprating of the value of child b However, the case for that uprating is made a stronger because, since 1975, we have experience effect of the Rooker-Wise amendment to the Finan of 1977, which provided for annual uprating c thresholds. Now, nearly every other significant long national insurance benefit is uprated annually, as the tax thresholds. Child benefit, however, is conspicuously subject to the vagaries of the Government and what the current Secretary of State for Social Services can persuade the Chancellor of the Exchequer to disgorge.

There is another instructive parallel with the Rooker-Wise amendment. The amendment was carried by support from Government Back Benchers who voted with the Opposition. Together, Opposition and Government Back Benchers were able to force the Government of the day to do what was right. If all those who have expressed support in the past for the uprating of child benefit, and all Conservative Members who are known to have made strong statements of support for it retention, were to vote with us tonight, we should achieve the same historic victory. All that is required is for them to show the same courage and join us in the Lobbies to protect and give a guaranteed future to the one benefit that mothers can claim as their own.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I am glad to have the opportunity to commend my new clause 4 to the House. I trust that my right hon. and hon. Friends will shortly make known that they have decided to accept it, because there are many very good reasons for their doing so, many of which have been put to the House ably and, in my opinion, convincingly by the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), who has just spoken for the Opposition.

As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, the difficulty in which the House finds itself is really because of the confused history of child benefits, which many people have forgotten. They have forgotten that such benefits emanated from the old child tax allowances. It is only some 10 years since the old tax allowance for children was done away with, and child benefit was put in its stead. But that has already been forgotten, so people do not realise that their child benefit is the way in which the Government reduce the burden of taxation for families.

Equally, of course, child benefits grew out of the family allowances that were brought in in 1945, with all-party agreement. Family allowances, because they were not taxed and did not arise from contributions, did not become part of the national insurance system either. They were a very popular benefit from the start, always very cheap to administer and always with a very high take-up. That remains the case, although the name has now been changed to child benefit. However, because they have never quite belonged in any of the major parts of the redistribution of income system, nobody quite understands where child benefits now fit into the general structure of welfare and family income support.

There are some people—I do not personally think that there are very many, but I know that there are some in this House, and there may be a certain number outside — who feel embarrassed about claiming their child benefit, because they have forgotten the history, and do not understand where the money is coming from and why they should be entitled to it. They feel that it is money for nothing, and that they have not done anything to deserve it. I personally think that mothers deserve credit for the work that they undertake on behalf of the nation, and that we should not be stingy with mothers who have children to support.

But there is also a kind of snobbery, which is unattractive, in the mouths of people who say that they do not need child benefit. They are implying t two nations, and that they belong to the su the country which is able to look after itself a and does not need help from anyone. The course, that there is also the subsidiary s people who cannot manage and have to b although it is no doubt humiliating for ther

I absolutely reject that type of approach it is quite wrong for the Conservative party o of it to slip into that attitude. The people wh would accept a tax cut because they woul some way it was their own money coming Equally, they would draw their nation pensions because they would not feel asha something to which they felt that they had co to which they were therefore entitled. How not quite understand child benefit, so they l very clear that they are embarrassed by it an not need it.

I trust that the Department Social Security has taken note of all the argu have been advancing in recent weeks. That inde happening in the Bill, where we are mo unpopular family income supplement to the — but, I think, still defective — family explain why I do not think that that form the right form of targeting.

In 1977 the number of supplementary be was under 3 million. At the end of 1987, claimants had risen to more than 5 mill significant social change and a significant number of people obliged to go to the DH have enough money to maintain themse families above the poverty line. If we loo than the claimants and take in the whole numbers are much more serious and in Looking at the total number of people in means-tested benefits of one kind or an including supplementary benefit, housing b family income supplement, the number w 14 million. That is a serious figure. By 19 up to 16 million.

But worse than that, from a parliament I received in the past few weeks, it seems another 4 million or 6 million people who are entitled to means-tested benefit, but who do not claim it either because they do not understand that they are entitled or because they are too proud to claim — which is very often the reason. It is particularly important not to drive those people down, as they see it, to become second-rate citizens. That surely should be a Conservative principle. Indeed, I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has embraced the idea of helping people out of dependency. He made it known that that was one of his particular targets when he took over the job. Yet he is going about it in precisely the wrong way.

I think that we ought not to be increasing the numbers. Quite apart from the social factors, looking at the workings of the economy, it is wrong to put people in a position where they are not supposed to be working because they are in receipt of benefit. What we do by that is to add to the numbers of people who are in the inert sector of the economy and have to be supported by other people's efforts rather than belonging to the dynamic sector where people work and save to make the economy work. It is bad economics and bad social policy to add to the number of people on means-tested benefits.

Let us suppose that child benefit continues to diminish in real value as it is diminishing as a result of the decision that the Department has announced for the current year. That is a drop of about 4 per cent. in the real value. That would mean that there would be still more people on the means test. Simultaneously, we are proposing to add substantially to the number of people on the means test by the introduction of the community charge. I do not want to debate the merits of that measure, but we have recognised that the community charge will be more than people who earn very low incomes or who have no incomes at all can pay. They will be shovelled on to the means test as well. If more than 20 million are already entitled and we are to add a whole lot more, targeting on the basis of the means test has got to stop—otherwise we will have more have-nots in the country than haves. The dynamics of the economy will go quite wrong.

The decision not to uprate the child benefit this year, with only a 4 per cent. difference—I agree that that is not a great figure — is important. From another parliamentary answer, I learned that 15,000 more families with 30,000 dependent children are expected to become entitled to income-related benefits. We do not know exactly what number that means, but it must be at least another 50,000 people who will be thrown on to the heap by the Department's decision just on this matter of uprating child benefit in this one year.

I think that it was a step in the wrong direction for several reasons. Perhaps there is something that will appeal to Conservative Members. In the Conservative manifesto, they will see that we said:

"Child benefit will continue to be paid as now."

It is possible to read into that a double meaning, I suppose. If people were relying on its real value continuing in the light of that commitment, it has already been proved that they read it wrong. It has already ceased to be true that child benefit will continue to be paid as it was at the time of the general election. It has fallen to what it was, less 4 per cent. I do not think that my right hon. Friends should invite their supporters on the Conservative Benches to play a trick such as that on 10,000 mothers in every average-sized parliamentary constituency. More than 6·5 million mothers draw this benefit and many will have no was said about child benefit at the time of the because they value it.

We are being invited now to play a trick mothers and say, "Aha, you have got it wrong. sentence really meant was that it would remain at arithmetical figure, regardless of its real value." in business in the private sector, one cannot affo tricks like that on one's customers, or one will n business for long. I do not believe that we should million mothers in that way either. That is my point of view.

There is a fundamental reason for giving sp to families. I do not want to take up too m particularly as we were late starting on th However, this is an important opportunity to g ground, and many people are involved in what t is going to decide about this matter.

A breadwinner with children and a sing without dependants get the same rate for the job work. The employer is not called on, and c expected, to differentiate between the needs o person and the needs of a breadwinner with a n dependants. The employer cannot make that d but the tax collector can. That was how it was d long ago as the end of the 18th century, when th tax system was brought in. William Pitt dec someone with children to support should be e claim a child allowance so that he did not pay as as someone with only a wife and himself, or hims to support.

That principle was the right one. It wa discontinued, I believe, for a time during the 19t and reinstated again in the tax system early in century. I think that we should stick to it, but not everyone is in the range of tax liability.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): Will my ho accept that there are many single people on lo paying tax and that if we continue with his pr they will be contributing through the tax syste increased child benefit to couples with substantia who do not need them? Surely it is better for the available to be targeted on the growing number to whom my hon. Friend has referred. My hon. F elucidated that the number is growing; surel evidence that the Government's policy is wor evidence that we should be going in the opposite

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I do not think w that the Government's policy of freeing peo dependency is working. There has been a signi in the number of people who are dependent o tested benefit. More than that, single people wh pay tax should recognise that their tax goes into t and that part of the benefit goes to married cou children. But someone brought up those sing They should be willing to contribute to bringi next generation in their turn, even though the married and do not have children of their own. W to a continuing society and those who have had t of being brought up in Britain must recognise have a duty to those who will be brought up in future.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Is not another the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys to his hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) that he is mistaking where we should be making cuts so that we can reduce the rate of taxation? We should not be deploying that argument. We should not be comparing a low-waged single person with a well-off family. We should be looking at the whole range of tax allowances and phasing them out so that we can have tax rates of something like 13p in the pound. That would meet the point about increasing child benefit.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: We should sit in the House until midnight if I were to start again on the campaign for tax credit. We may touch on it on another occasion; I have not changed my views about it.

People who are not in the tax system cannot get a differentiation in their spending power because they have family responsibilities. As long ago as the end of the 18th century that problem was also recognised. It is nothing new. The magistrates in Speenhamland decided that they would use parish funds to subsidise poor families with children. Many people have laughed at them, and, because of the effect of its intervention in the labour market, the system had to be wound up.

The repeal of the Corn Laws in 1846 was a measure primarily to help large families, because they were the people who were most affected by the high prices of food. Free public education was established in 1870, with a similar effect. The 20th century saw the beginning of the national insurance system for dependants. In the 1940s the National Health Service was set up, which was to be of more use to a large family group than to a smaller one. In 1945 family allowances were introduced, and in the 1970s there was the family income supplement. Now, in 1988, we are embarking on family credit.

We recognise the value of all those measures, because we know that nutritional standards, a good environment, reasonable clothing and stable and secure family life are very important in the upbringing of the citizens of the next generation. Wherever the money comes from, the income of families with children should not be reduced. I regret the fact that this 4 per cent. reduction is on the programme for the coming year.

Is all this means testing the right way to help? More than half the mothers who claim child benefit are in families which pay more tax than the value of their benefits. Since we have dismantled child tax allowances, bringing that system back would be an administrative nightmare and would complicate PAYE for employers in a way that we cannot contemplate. The same applies to the ridiculous suggestion of bringing child benefit back into the tax system. That would be a clear example of churning and double counting. It is not a helpful suggestion.

For taxpayers, child benefit is their tax cut. If taxes are to be reduced this year, let them be targeted on families this time, by increasing child benefit rather than by releasing the money preferentially to single people, as happened in 1987. By his welcome and well-received tax cut of 2 per cent., the Chancellor actually gave more benefit to single people than to married couples, and married couples with children did not receive any particular benefit at all in recognition of their family responsibilities. That was wrong. This year, if tax cuts are again in the pipeline—as we are told—I trust that the Chancellor this time will think seriously about increasing the benefit to families and targeting ben preferentially by increasing child benefits the right way.

What is to be done for people on low i little tax or no tax at all? Do we carry down into dependency and leaving them credit, or do we try to find a way to give help which they can see to be their own m That is really what the Conservative seeking to do. I trust that my right hon. will take that obligation seriously and will have a golden opportunity to reform the not waste time. People should receive m support which they will not lose if they wo to better themselves.

Among the 4 to 6 million non-clai people in Kensington whom I know and because of their determination to keep from the need to apply for means-tes should be encouraging that spirit rathe more and more difficult for such people.

Friend the Minist to the debate to say whether the Govern undertaking to review the national in finances, its operations and its co particular reference to family income plainly the way to liberate millions fro give them back their self-respect.

Mr. Frank Field: I shall be brief, partl two speeches have covered the ground covered. However, I shall pick up one p hon. Friend the Member for Livingston his speech. He very ably drew one experience of the Labour Government i out how important it was for Conservati on their own conscience. Indeed, thin 1974-76 Government, most hon. Members would be hard-pressed to remember who was in that Government, but most hon. Members can remember the Lawson-Rooker-Wise amendment. It seems that the important moral that my hon. Friend was drawing, although he did not trouble to underline it, was that if Governments are to be effective, it is crucial that they should have independent Back Benchers behind them. We have one hon. Member in her place today, who, rightly, is remembered from that Parliament because she voted as she believed it was important to vote. When one is in opposition it is not always that easy to vote against the Whip. It must be many many times more difficult to vote against the Whip in government. During that period of the Labour Government two of my hon. Friends stood out—my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise), whose constituency was then Coventry, South-West, and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker).

I hope that tonight Conservative Members will act with similar courage. Time is often taken up, particularly by people in the Press Gallery, debating who will be the next on the Front Bench and who will be moved sideways or down, and that also commands a lot of interest among Members. But that is of momentary importance compared with influencing the course of Government. I am sad to say that the previous Labour Government was usually influenced when Back Benchers rather than Whips won control. I hope in the near future to serve as a Back Bencher when my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston is Secretary of State. I shall do my best to organise votes against him on those matters when, although his heart will be with us, the whipping system will be against us.

In some ways, the debate is simple, but it also has a complexity. When the Secretary of State made his uprating statement, perhaps because he was new in the job, he presented it as though there were clear choices. Today's debate shows that we do not have clear choices. The Government have a number of objectives, some of which can clash.

Some of the objectives touched upon by the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) are central to the Government's philosophy. It is said that the Government support the family. The hon. Gentleman drew attention to the importance of this benefit going to women as of right. That objective, which the Tory party holds high, is one side of the equation of competing objectives.

The Government also believe in tax equity—that at any one time a balance must be struck between what people contribute, given their different incomes and family responsibilities. It has been the Government's prejudice, with which I agree, that wherever there is doubt one should decide in favour of taxpayers with children and against those without such a responsibility.

That has been the rhetoric, but the sad fact is that the record of Budgets since 1979 shows that, despite what they say, the Government have weighted the tax system in favour of single people and childless couples and against those with children. Again, this is a chance for Tory Back Benchers to assert principles on which many of them have been elected during the past three years.

The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) made a valid point in an intervention when he asked how we can defend the payment of child benefit to our constituents on £20,000 a year when many of our constituents pay tax on low incomes and are single. Can we defend su from single people on low incomes to those v on higher incomes?

I was not commending the ideas of the h for Kensington on tax credit when I interv proposing a much simpler scheme. Given tha time the Chancellor has forgone taxing 50 personal income—the present cost of all the and concessions that we give—if we ar about meeting the tax equity point for pe incomes, we should be looking at ways of those tax benefits so that we can massively re of tax. That is the right course to take to m made by the hon. Member for Ryedale. A per income would not then be making such a That is the proper way to deal with the mat proper to take away from people with childre meet the point. The tax equity point is on t of the equation when Government Back Be about this issue.

Mr. John Greenway: I am grateful Gentleman for his comments and for the point has been taken on board. However, do that when the House divides later this eveni so against the background of the existing ta not what might be produced at some future

Mr. Field: Just as my hon. Friends the Perry Barr and for Preston could vote only before them and made a big difference, so to vote only on the amendment that we are deba when we discuss the Budget we can return t and be more ambitious in our targets.

Another issue which clearly comes down the Government's wish to tackle poverty. H choice between a benefit that we know everyb up, including those who are poor, and a tar that the Government are now proudly claimi cent. will take up, although many Conservat must know that if over 60 per cent. do so they well.

There is a real trade-off there on which Members can make a decision. Which is the advance? There is the certainty of making families benefit, although some would argu families do not need the money—I hope dealt with that argument—or a targeted ap result of which even on the Government's they are not worried at the moment because have to face questions about what is happe the scheme is not in existence—some poor not pick up the benefit to which they are en we see the beginning of the trade-off which sh issue is not as simple as the Secretary of St when introducing his uprating statement.

The last point, which I hope will bring h down firmly in favour of the new cl Government's wish to increase people's inde we in the House were serious about that, looking at changes in our tax system which the money, not to increase child benefit by the small amount over which we are squab —but by a substantial amount. [Mr. Field] throw their books in. The opportunity to build on a part-time income and to conduct their lives without officials poking their sticky fingers into their private lives is one at which most people would jump.

We are talking about whether we should move to an incentive-based society in which all can participate, or whether we should continue in an incentive-based society which excludes that growing under-class which all hon. Members are witnessing in their constituencies, whether we represent prosperous or less prosperous areas.

This is not a clear issue with everything in favour of the argument on one side and everything opposing it on the other. When any political decision is made, a balance must be struck, but I hope that the three speeches that have been made so far tonight have shown overwhelmingly what that balance must be. I hope that tonight Conservative Members will have the courage to make an advance such as we saw in 1975 when, in a small but important way, we began to change our tax system. That change came about as a result of the courage of Back Benchers to take on their Government and I wish hon. Members such success tonight.

Mr. Timothy Raison (Aylesbury): Those hon. Members who have already spoken have carefully set out a compelling case. Reference has already been made to the words in last year's Conservative manifesto:

"Child benefit will continue to be paid as now, and direct to the mother."

As has been said, it is possible to interpret those words as meaning merely that child benefit will go on. Nevertheless, the vast bulk of the population who thought about the matter would have assumed that the system was to go on as it is at present; in other words, that uprating would continue to be built into it. To back away from that would be to adopt a weasly interpretation of those words in the manifesto.

Hon. Members have set out clearly the argument in favour of continuing uprating and the arguments in favour of child benefit as a mechanism. There is not much that I can add to that, but I want briefly to go over the important points.

One important point, as has been said already, is that when child benefit was introduced in 1977 it replaced the child tax and family allowances with a universal benefit. The aim was to extend the child tax allowance to all children. That aim was right. It was accepted at the time and has been accepted since.

As the House knows, child tax allowance has long been a part of our history. It goes back to the days of William Pitt in 1796. Pitt said:

"Let us make relief in cases where there are a number of children a matter of right and a matter of honour."

It runs against that philosophy not to uprate child benefit.

6.30 pm

We accept the notion that tax allowances should increase in line with inflation which, as the House has heard, is exactly what has been happening. Tax allowances have risen with inflation thanks to the Rooker-Wise-Lawson amendment and they will continue to do so. If we do not allow child benefit to increase with inflation, we shall be negating part of the essence of the reform introduced in 1977. In a sense, it was a deal. The two old benefits—child tax allowance and family allowance—went and child benefit was introduced in their place. It was clearly understood that child benefit would rise in the same way as tax allowances had risen. Since then, we have witnessed the institutionalisation and legalisation of the fact that tax allowances rise with inflation. To let child benefit stand still is to backtrack on history. My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) made a relevant point when he asked why poorish taxpayers' money should go to those who are palpably better off. It is because of the history of the arrangements as well as because of the general advantages of child benefit that it is right to continue with the uprating process that has become a familiar part of the system over the past decade.

We know the other arguments in favour of child benefit. It is a secure and uncontested source of help and regular income to those who have to bear the extra cost of bringing up children. William Pitt recognised that extra cost, which is just as real today as it was then. Child benefit implies a regular commitment to the family; surely our party has always stood for trying to help the family and those with children. To backtrack on it would be a very unwelcome move. Child benefit goes to the mother, which is important. It is especially important that it goes to the mother who stays at home and looks after her children, as she does not share the opportunities of working mothers who have their own money in their pockets. Child benefit helps to offset the poverty trap. Its universality, which has been criticised, contains a significant merit: child benefit increases but it does not promote the poverty trap at the same time.

If child benefit is pegged, as the Government intend, we shall hit perhaps not the poorest families—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister pointed out that there are other ways of helping the very poorest—but those who are not quite so poor, whose income falls just above the level at which they can claim selective benefits. It must be said that one or two of our other policies also tend to hit that group. I refer to the poll tax and to the introduction of capital limits on housing benefits. It would be a great mistake to go in for a policy that would make life more difficult for those in that group.

I do not understand why the Government have had this change of heart. In the Green Paper on the reform of social security in 1985, the Government said:

"The case for changing it"—

child benefit—

"has not been made out. The Government do not therefore propose to alter its basis or structure."

Although I acknowledge that it has not been sanctified in statute, I believe that regular uprating has been part of the basis of child benefit. Finally, there is the 1987 manifesto commitment, which there is no need to repeat.

Let me finish with one other quotation. Speaking on 28 July 1980, the then Secretary of State for Social Services said:

"it is our intention, subject to economic and other circumstances, to uprate child benefit each year to maintain its value."—[Official Report, 28 July 1980; Vol. 989, c. 1063.]

Of course, economic circumstances have changed since 1980—for the better. The Government are more able to maintain the uprating than they were in 1980. If one looks at the picture with any sense of humanity, one can see that the right policy is to continue regularly to uprate child benefit.

Mr. Ronnie Fearn (Southport): We had a long debate on this subject in the Standing Committee. Therefore, I propose to put my comments in a nutshell. Nevertheless, they are most sincere. I shall support new clause 1 and I see great merit in new clause 4, too.

The effect of the new clause would be to halt the relative decline in the tax-free income of families with children compared with that of single and childless people. Since 1979, the real level of the single person's tax allowance has risen by 14 per cent. and of the married man's tax allowance by 17 per cent.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): My memory is obviously failing me. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be kind enough to refer us to the discussion in the Standing Committee. As I remember it, the Liberal spokesman was absent on a number of occasions. When he was present, he voted consistently with the Labour Opposition. I can remember no debate on child benefit, although some of us might have wished to take part in such a debate.

Mr. Fearn: I remember that the majority of Conservative Members took no part whatever in the debate.

Since 1979 the real level of the married man's tax allowance has risen by 17 per cent., whereas child benefit's real value has declined by 3 per cent. As child benefit replaced the old child tax allowance as well as the family allowance, it is now the only means in the tax and benefit system of achieving some degree of equity between those with, and those without, children. In the run-up to a Budget that is likely to include further cuts in taxation, it seems appropriate to voice the widespread view that increases in child benefit's real value should be seen as a form of tax cut targeted on families with children.

Child benefit can also be seen as an efficient means of redistributing income over a family's life cycle to the point at which it is most needed. Individuals pay national insurance contributions and draw the benefits when they are needed. Similarly, child benefit, paid for through taxation, targets resources to the stage in a family's life at which, whatever its income, needs are greater and that income is usually lower. I maintain that we must retain the true value of child benefit.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): Essentially, the five speeches that we have heard so far have been pleas for universal, as opposed to means-tested, benefits. Those pleas have been made eloquently, both by my hon. Friends and by Opposition Members. However, hon. Members have not extended the logic of the argument to other benefits or pointed out that such arrangements are a recipe for high taxation. I shall return to the argument about universal benefits, because that subject is raised very precisely by this debate.

First, let me reflect that this debate arises because the Government did not uprate child benefit last year. One fact that has emerged, which many people have not realised, is that 3 million of the 12 million who benefit —the 3 million poorest—would not have benefited from an uprating. The failure to uprate has enabled the Secretary of State to direct the additional money to the poorest children as child benefit could never have done. Perhaps we should be grateful that the whole question of how families in need should be helped has been raised.

We spend more than £4·5 billion on child benefit, paying it to nearly 7 million families. Of those 7 million, two thirds — 4·75 million — pay more tax than they receive in child benefit. That is an incredibly inefficient way of helping the poor and raises three aspects which one might, in the nicest possible way, call nonsense. The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) referred to one of them, although he thought that it was a good aspect of child benefit that it transferred income from husbands to wives. It is no function of the state to have one of its agencies, the Inland Revenue, taxing husbands, and another, the Department of Health and Social Security, paying the money over to their wives. We should leave families who are not beneficiaries of child benefit or of the system for helping families with children to look after themselves.

Secondly, it seems nonsense to tax families and to pay them benefits. There are not just transfers from husband to wife; family units pay tax to one agency of the state and receive the same or less money back from another agency of the state. That is an extraordinarily inefficient way of helping the poor and a bad way for the state to interfere in people's lives.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams rose——

Mr. Maples: If I may just make my third point, I shall, of course, give way to my hon. Friend.

Thirdly — this point has been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) — it seems wrong to tax people who are low earners but who do not happen to have children, and to pay child benefit to people who are often on above-average earnings. One can take as an example a young single person who might be a shop assistant earning about £100 a week. Why should he or she pay tax to help finance the child benefit that is paid to people who may receive one and a half, two or even three times average earnings?

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: On my hon. Friend's argument, it would be wrong for a pensioner to draw his national insurance pension and to pay tax at the same time. He ought to renounce his pension.

Mr. Maples: With the greatest respect to my hon. Friend, old-age pensions are paid from national insurance contributions. People who draw pensions have paid the contributions to finance them. Benefits that are paid for on a contributory basis are entirely different from benefits that are financed out of general taxation. Child benefit is financed out of general taxation; pensions are not.

Mr. Frank Field: Will the hon. Gentleman ask his right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench the size that the pension would be if it were paid out on contributions only? Most people's old-age pensions are not paid because they have built up a contribution record but because of the amount of money that we pay in in the current week.

Mr. Maples: I do not know the precise calculations. However, I do know that one cannot draw the old-age pension without having paid national insurance contributions for a long time. However, one can draw child benefit without ever having paid any tax or national insurance contributions.

To return to my three points relating to the transfers of money from husbands to wives, from families to the Inland Revenue, to the Department of Health and Social Security and back to the families and from low-income earners to high-income earners, it seems to me that we have devised a most inefficient way of helping the poor and one which involves great expense. It should not be beyond human ingenuity to devise a way of helping poor families. Indeed, I think that we should do so more generously. If, to help poor families, we have to help rich ones also, it is, incredibly expensive. We should try to devise a method of giving such help rather more generously than we do to people who really need it.

All hon. Members who have spoken have made eloquent pleas for universal, as opposed to means-tested, benefits. The ultimate extension of that would be for the state to take 90 per cent. or 100 per cent. of a person's income and to pay 90 per cent. or 100 per cent. back in benefit. I remind my hon. Friends that that is a wholly Socialist idea. It was articulated eloquently and at great length in Anthony Crosland's book, "The Future of Socialism", the overwhelming theme of which is the plea that the Government should raise a large amount of money in taxation. Indeed, eight years after reading it, that is the only thing that I remember clearly about it—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) may have been there; I do not know. The overwhelming theme was that the Government should raise large amounts of money in taxation and then give universal benefits, at a high level.

The hon. Members who have spoken have prayed that argument in aid of the present system of child benefit. They did not say that it could perfectly logically be extended to all sorts of other benefits, and that the price that we must pay for it is high taxation such as we saw under the previous Labour Government. That is not the state's business. Its business is raising as little money as it needs to perform its proper functions and to discharge its proper responsibilities. The state should raise as little tax as it possible can to do so. Clearly, one of the state's responsibilities is to help families with children who would otherwise be in need. I would suggest—I feel strongly about this—that it is not the state's business to raise large amounts of taxation to help those families who are not in need, but that is the system we have.

I accept the criticism mentioned by those hon. Members who argued for universal benefits, that means-tested benefits accentuate the poverty trap. That is true.

Sir Ian Gilmour (Chesham and Amersham) rose——

6.45 pm

Mr. Maples: I shall give way to my right hon. Friend once I have dealt with the question of the poverty trap.

The new social security system which I believe will be introduced this year and in which family credit, income support and housing benefit will be related to after-tax income, will go a long way to ameliorating what has been the worst aspect of the——

Mr. Frank Field: It is tiny.

Mr. Maples: The hon. Gentleman says, "It is tiny," but the poverty trap used to be able to reach effective levels of withdrawal of over 100 per cent.—indeed, of 130 per cent. or 135 per cent. As I understand it, under the new system it will never be able to reach 100 per cent.—[Interruption.] There must be a withdrawal rate of means-tested benefit. I do not see anything wrong with that. I do not think that it is the same as taxing people.

To say that giving a person a benefit because they would otherwise be in poverty and in need and then withdrawing it as they get wealthier is the same as imposing a level of income tax on them is to turn the definitions of tax and benefit on their heads. I accept that there must be a withdrawal rate. The steepness of the taper will reflect what the Government feel they can afford at any given time and their policy and priorities. It seems perfectly reasonable that there should be a taper. That is not the same as a marginal tax rate——

Mr. Robin Cook rose——

Sir Ian Gilmour rose——

Mr. Maples: I give way to my right hon. Friend.

Sir Ian Gilmour: The bias of my hon. Friend's argument seems to be that there should be no differentiation in the tax system between families with children and single persons or couples without children. Is that right?

Mr. Maples: No, not entirely, because we have a married man's tax allowance which benefits married men who do not have children. In general, I believe that those people, whether single, married or with children, who have adequate incomes with which to look after themselves and their own affairs should be left to do so. Those who do not should be helped. It may have been forced out of me, but that is a clearer statement of what I think. We should be looking—I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is doing so—for a more effective way of helping families with children who are in need and who would otherwise be in poverty instead of raising £4·6 billion from 7 million families and giving it back to those 7 million when only 2·5 million of the 7 million actually benefit.

Mrs. Audrey Wise (Preston): The hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) has just spoken about inefficiency, but the fact is that he has been unable to suggest any method of giving assistance to families such as he has described which does not involve the most incredibly complicated bureaucracy. It is a characteristic of means-tested benefits that they involve complicated assessments, a large bureaucracy, reviews and, whether we like it or not, stigma and gross interference in the lives of people on low incomes. That may not be of any concern to Conservative Members, but it does concern many people in this country.

There is nothing efficient about means-tested benefits. They fail to carry out the targeting function placed on them. In contrast, universal benefits have the advantages of being cheap to collect. They do not involve complicated reviews, tribunals or assessment officers. They are simply paid to those who qualify by means of a simple fact—in this case that there are children of the relevant age. The present system is an efficient way of paying money and of targeting. It is a fact that at any given level of income people with children are in a worse financial position than people without children at the same level of income, and it is a fact that most of the people who are in poverty in this country have children.

If it were simple to direct means-tested benefits so that they do reach their targets, poor children would have been lifted out of poverty long ago. We have had eight years of a Government who have told us on every conceivable occasion that they are trying to lift poor families out of their poverty. However, they have manifestly failed to do so.

Those hon. Members who have referred to the tax allowance system and who directed our minds back to the origins of child benefit were on absolutely the right lines. For many years after the introduction of the family allowance system in, I believe, 1948, we had a dual system. With family allowances, a poor level of money was paid universally. Child tax allowances were more valuable but did not cover the whole population, because they did not include those who were too poor to pay tax. Those two systems continued in tandem, but the position was uneasy and unsatisfactory. Many of us were pleased when the Labour Government decided that the system should be abandoned and child tax allowances should be switched so that we paid child benefit instead.

The hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) reminded the House that people forget that child benefit stands in place of child tax allowances, and he did us a favour in so doing. It is important not to forget that child benefit did not drop from heaven; it stands in place of child tax allowances. Families who previously received child tax allowances were deprived of those allowances because they were being replaced by something that we thought would be better. So the deprivation was in name and not in fact. We favoured child benefit because we truly believed it would benefit children. That it does so has already been pointed out, and I shall not labour the point unduly, but, in view of the speech made by the hon. Member for Lewisham, West, it is important to point out that it benefits children because it goes to families who are too low paid to pay tax, and it benefits mothers. Those are substantial advantages.

However, an unexpected result arose from the Government's peculiar method of accounting. I am not making a party political point. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides find it as incomprehensible as I do that child or any other tax allowances are not regarded as a public expense, but child benefit is. Even if the amount paid had been left at exactly the same level as it was when under the heading of child tax allowance, the latter was not counted as public expenditure, but as soon as it was labelled child benefit it became so counted. That is a peculiarity of the Treasury, and it is no justification for taking it out on kids.

When discussing labels and benefits, we must not lose sight of the main fact, which is that we want child benefit to be preserved — nay, increased — in value because families need the money. At any given level of income, childless people are better off than people with children. There is no justification for that. Our society needs children; we need to replace ourselves. We need people to be the future workers who will look after us in our old age, whether they be our own children or those of the community. Children are a benefit, a blessing and a necessity to society, and it is up to us to ensure that they live in families with the necessary financial resources to keep them well, happy and in good order. That is what child benefit is about.

It costs a lot of money to bring up children, and it is perfectly justifiable for single people to pay taxes to help with the care of children. It astonishes me that when hon. Members adduce examples, they always choose the low-paid single person and the wealthy parent. Most parents are not wealthy. If one has children, regardless of whether the mother goes out to work, the family income suffers. Obviously, it suffers most during the time when she stays at home. Most mothers stay at home for considerable periods of time. Clearly, that does tremendous damage to the family income, but when the mother returns to work, the family income does not suddenly leap to what it would have been. She will probably have lost an opportunity to enhance her income. If one has children, one's expenses when working are higher. Child care must be paid for, and more has to be spent on domestic equipment and all sorts of things to help with the running of the house. Even two-income families with children find it harder going than two-income families without. These are simple matters, and everyone outside understands them now.

There was a time when Governments were nervous about family allowances and child benefits — and certainly about abolishing child tax allowances. The hon. Member for Kensington is right. The Labour Government found this a difficult problem and had to be constantly reminded—especially by their Back Benchers—that most of the electorate were women. Governments of any colour make a great mistake when they feel nervous of the voters because they see them as irate males resenting the transfer from their wallets to the handbags. But the handbags are held by more hands than are the wallets.

Because we realised these straightforward facts, we were able to persuade the Labour Government to stick to their guns and go ahead and transfer to child benefit, but we never anticipated that the new device would be used by Governments in the future as an easy way of freezing the benefit or allowing it to be eroded. That was a wholly unexpected side effect. I feel like a doctor who has administered a drug to someone in good faith and then discovers a completely unexpected side effect.

The Government would not dare freeze child tax allowances if they still existed. After the amendment to which copious reference has been made this evening, it has been established that the tax threshold must rise at least in line with prices. That is now the received orthodoxy. The whole establishment has now followed the former rebels. The Government would not have dared to allow child tax allowance values to be eroded. So it is up to all of us who favoured the change to child benefit — not only Opposition Members — to prevent the side effect from continuing. It should be as unthinkable to allow child benefit value to be eroded as to allow tax thresholds to be eroded.

I join my hon. Friends who have called on Conservative Members to act in accordance with their consciences. I give Conservative Members some advice straight from the shoulder. The Government will not harm the Opposition if they resist the new clause. We shall not suffer. Listening to the long list of organisations read out by my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), one knows that the Opposition have, behind and alongside them, many people of all sorts, incomes and constituencies. We shall not be harmed by our stand tonight. The Government and children will be harmed. Sometimes it is up to Government Back Benchers to defend their Government and compel them to act in the better interests of their party. It does not matter to me if the Conservative Government harm themselves. If that were all that was at stake, I would say, "Go ahead; carry on; we will make the most of it," but I would much rather we did not have to receive any credit for standing firm against the Government tonight, because of the harm that will be done by them to children, families and mothers.

When Conservative Members go into the Lobby tonight they should bear in mind that if they vote in favour of the amendments they will be defending their manifesto. They should remember that, in the end, it is the

[Mrs. Audrey Wise]

Government in power who get the credit for any improvement in benefits. The Opposition will not get the credit even if the amendments are accepted—the credit will go to the Government. However, it is the children who will benefit and that is what is important to us.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): It is a particular pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise), who has an honourable record on this issue and one that is recognised as such by hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber.

There have been some interesting suggestions about possible changes in the system of taxation or benefits. However, we come back to the fact that any decision tonight will be based upon our existing tax and credit system. Therefore, I restate what has been stated by many other hon. Members: the most effective way, under our present system, to assist the reduction in family poverty is through the payment of child benefit. There is no argument about that. We can argue among ourselves about the balance of priorities and how we would like to change things so that they could be slightly better, but there can be no argument about the payment of child benefit. Indeed, such a payment may be linked with the view that I believe is held by most hon. Members—the defence of the concept of the family. We should not pay lip service to that concept but should translate it into reality.

For some years there has been a net transfer of resources from families to those without families. We must recognise that and the debate takes place within that context. When we consider that trend and the desire to defend the family we should surely conclude that there is no case for reducing, in real terms, the amount of available credit. There is every case for seeking to start to redress the balance and to give practical assistance to families.

I welcome the assistance that has been given to low-income families as a result of the recent changes announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. However, my right hon. Friend knows better than any of us that, with the most optimistic take-up figures that may be expected, there will still be between one in four and one in five families who will not take up the means-tested benefit. By definition, those families are the poorest in our society. Some of my colleagues imagine that our problems would be solved if we could only remove the rich people from the system and concentrate on paying those on low incomes. However, they should grasp the central fact that the price of that policy would be that many families would simply not receive the support which we believe they should receive and which the state lays down they are entitled to receive. Indeed, it is interesting that, almost unique to this subject—if I may qualify the word unique—the statement "they do not need it" arises. Certain people seem to be able to say of child benefit, "They do not need it". I do not hear such a statement about tax cuts. I did not hear it when we raised the level of mortgage interest relief. On the contrary, many of my hon. Friends said that that increase was overdue and that things were difficult for first time buyers. However, with regard to child benefit, we have reached the stage of being expert at judging what people do or do not need.

The effect of child benefit for those who are pay more tax than they receive in benefit is that of a tax cre albeit through a different financial system—the DH We have not changed that system and we can only w within it; indeed, there is no better way.

I always listen to my hon. Friend the Member Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) with considerable res as he speaks on financial matters with much authority. almost persuaded me that I had to choose betw universal benefits and means-tested benefits. Howeve am not sure that I have to make that choice. I believe a system solely composed of universal benefits woul so inexplicably and disastrously expensive that it wo rightly, be rejected by all my hon. Friends. Equall system composed solely of means-tested benefit—u whatever system—would cement a two-class syste our country. There would be a permanent under-clas those who had to apply for every element of assista The combination of means-tested and universal ben avoids that dreadful scenario.

I believe that by linking child benefit to the pre system, as proposed in the new clause, we will be abl do something positive for families and especially fam in need.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, W For a number of years the Conservative Wom Organisation—it represents more than 500,000 wo throughout the United Kingdom—has made the cer piece of its submission to the Chancellor every Febr before his Budget the retention of child benefit universal benefit, the retention of child benefit as a benefit and the continuing payment of child benefit to mother.

What does the Conservative Women's Organisa mean by a "real benefit?" It means that that benefit sh rise in line with inflation and preferably by more inflation. The meaning of universal benefit is explanatory—it should be paid to everyone irrespe of income and background. It should be paid to who has children—single parents or married people. organisation believes that anyone who has a child sh benefit. The Conservative Women's Organisation beli that that is important, because it believes it is represen the party of the family.

What does the family mean today? It no longer m a married couple with two or three children with one of household working. In the past 20 years, the family changed beyond all recognition. The family now mean sorts of things. It can mean the single parent with a or more than one child. It can mean a married couple one person working, although that represents a s fraction of today's families. It can mean two pa working with children. It can mean two parents ou work with children and, of course, it can mean a ma couple with no children. The modern family is a different animal from the sort of family that we may r if we cast our minds back to the immediate post-war y

These days, I believe that the definition of the fa really means concentrating on helping children. C benefit is unique, in that it does just that. How have Chancellor and the Secretary of State responded to Conservative Women's Organisation's submission year? They have responded with the worst possible an —they have frozen child benefit. That has resulte the wealthy couple, with the non-working wife, contin to draw child benefit. Indeed, one couple that I know and value draw child benefit for four children. They then take the children out for dinner at an immensely grand restaurant with the bill coming to about £135—and why not? It is their benefit and it is their right.

However, with the freezing of child benefit, the poor, who depend on child benefit to balance their budgets, have suffered drastically. I do not just mean the statutory single parent with children living in an inner-city environment who may be held up as being most at risk as a result of freezing child benefit. I think of the farmer's wife who lives near me at home. She has only 40 cows and, with milk quotas, is having a terrible time making ends meet and tells me that she cannot do without child benefit. She has only two children. It is a very slender input into her family budget in terms of cash value, but, in terms of the proportion of her budget, it matters immensely. The freezing of child benefit has brought her close to the poverty margin. We have got the worst of all worlds by freezing child benefit. A genuine debate on the value of child benefit to our society is long overdue. Indeed, the debate should be even wider and certainly much better attended than it is tonight.

I hope very much that the Minister will spend considerable time this year discussing within his Department and then in the wider context of Parliament what we should do about child benefit. Every year, child benefit comes up rather like a punchball, but we are lucky if child benefit is raised. Other people believe that it is good if it is frozen. Some people would prefer to have it thrown out of the window. Can we not discuss this thoroughly and properly and then have it either thrown aside, modified or firmly linked to our economic structure, so that the people who receive child benefit—the mothers—know exactly where they stand?

This debate spills over inevitably into the reform of personal taxation. The married man's tax allowance has already been mentioned. That was created at a time when married women did not work. In 1936, 6 per cent. of all married women worked. That figure is now 63 per cent. and married women are the fastest growing sector of the working population, so times have changed. The married man's tax allowance was meant as a bolstering operation: to recognise the value of children and the immense drain that they make on a family budget. The married man's tax allowance is now wholly outdated and goes to a large number of people who have no children. With so many working women, it should be cast aside and forgotten. The money should be recycled and used in a different way. Possibly it should be put towards a universal benefit, such as child allowance.

Some hon. Members have mentioned their unhappiness —quite proper in some respects—about wealthy people receiving child benefit. Speaking from the woman's point of view, there are many older non-working women—the younger married women usually tend to work—whose husbands, although receiving large incomes, do not respond as they should and do not give their wives the housekeeping money that they need to support their children. Their wives are relatively poor, and therefore their children are relatively poorer. It is a grave error to think that, because a man is wealthy and because he is a member of that shrinking band of heads of households who are single earners, he will respond as he should to his wife. It is a peculiar aberration among the wealthy that they sometimes think that they are poorer than they are and do not even support their own families.

I cannot offer the perfect solution to this ever-growing and difficult problem. I ask for a firm and genuine commitment from the Minister that he will take seriously to heart the need to solve this problem once and for all. He must support the care and nurture of our children in a much broader and more positive and generous way than our country is historically used to doing. I have long thought that we undervalue children and, as a society, we suffer as a result.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I cannot help thinking that in this debate we are perhaps straying a little far from the point. In line with the cost of living increase, the Government were proposing to put, in cash terms, an additional £120 million into child benefit, but have decided not to do so. In taking that decision, they have taken account of the key point. However, by putting an increased amount into child benefit, they are spreading these additional resources indiscriminately among all families with children in this country. It is wholly indiscriminate and ineffectual to fire off these resources at families, regardless of income, as this would include families of hon. Members and families of people better paid than hon. Members.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Would my hon. Friend prefer an untargeted tax cut which would relieve the tax burden of families with and without children and of single people? Does he think that that would be a more acceptable use of resources?

Mr. Arnold: No, I do not. We must consider carefully how that £120 million has been applied. By spreading it over the general population, we shall miss having the maximum effect on the very under-class to which the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) referred. Better-off families will benefit from such an increase in child benefit, but the families about whom we should be concerned—the under-class, containing 3 million children, who are already on benefit — would lose 10p for every 10p increase in child benefit and get a net cash increase of zero.

It seems far wiser to take the path proposed by the Government, to take that £120 million, add to it afresh £80 million and apply that £200 million to the family credit scheme, which is to be introduced in April, over and above the amount currently applied through family income supplement. That targeting is far more relevant. If we care about the children of this country, we should care for the children of parents who can cope and for those children in the greatest need of resources for their development. The Government are concentrating on those children in need, and they have my support.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Almost everything that needs to be said in this debate has been said and I shall be brief. We are debating a balance of pragmatisms. It is wonderful to have theoretical designs and I should love to have such a wonderfully well-integrated tax and benefit system that there was no disincentive for people to go out to work or to catch buses at 6 o'clock in the morning to augment a fully-declared income. These things may one day come about, although I grow increasingly wary of them. The cost of moving to a fully integrated tax and benefit system is in the short term horrendous and very few Governments would be able to find the resources to do it.

We are now discussing a balance of practicalities. That balance lies in uprating child benefit. For all the reasons listed in the debate tonight, it is important that families, who notoriously are the least likely to understand a complex system of claiming, should be able to receive benefit as of right, rather than having to go through a series of hoops, many of which are difficult to understand, difficult of access or unattractive to them. It is wholly appropriate that, until the system is running better, we should make it possible for people to have a benefit which retains its value year on year, so that they know that, whatever happens to the economy, that part of their income will be secure.

I am conscious of the fact that Ministers are trying to act from good motives. They are trying to target the poorest and to ensure that the least well off families will benefit. One of the mistakes that they make is that they are having to do it within their DHSS budget.

The issue goes wider than that. I have often heard it said with considerable credibility that one would need fewer social workers if the income of the clients of many social workers were higher, and the incomes of social workers were paid from the same budget within the same Ministry.

Referring to the balance of pragmatisms, we should remember that when the Government were elected in 1979, one of their clearest policy statements was that they would become the Government of a society in which perks were done away with; that everything would become a matter of income and income tax; and it would be very much more straightforward. Of course, practicalities have intervened and we have taken policy decisions, such as not phasing out mortgage relief and continuing to allow tax relief for various business expenses, although gradually the Inland Revenue is putting the squeeze on some of them.

It is because we move in an essentially imperfect world that I support strongly what my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison) said. On too many occasions, recent policy decisions have squeezed rather harder than is fair those who are just above the poorest level, as we move towards what I hope will be a better system. If we put the little bits of the jigsaw in first, the wrong people are being damaged. For that reason, I support the intention to uprate child benefit.

Mr. Scott: We have had an excellent debate, with strong feelings arising on this issue. We are touching on familiar ground because in the statement and the order we have discussed this year's uprating. I understand why hon. Members have questioned the attitude of the Government and future Governments to the benefit. In essence, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) in everything except his conclusion. What we are doing essentially is making a pragmatic and balanced judgment, which flows from the decision of the Government not to uprate child benefit this year, about whether it is right to tie the hands of future Ministers on the use of resources that go into uprating child benefit, or whether they should have the opportunity to decide on the use of those resources year by year, in the light of unforeseeable demands which might exist.

Mr. Raison: My intervention is triggered by th "resources". This year, more than other years, there the signs that resources are available.

Mr. Scott: I am not discussing this year; I am about tying th hands of the Government to a resources in uccessive years, ignorant of w resources will b available or, assuming they are, w this is the best way to spend them. The House address that qu tion tonight.

Mr. Frank F ld: Will the Minister bring bef House shortly a oposal for the de-indexation of b and tax allowan so that there will be total free the future?

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman knows better tha I was trying to identify the issue, which I hope the will address before voting tonight and will not be away by some of the arguments and issues raised of which are wider than the pragmatic and ba decision which I hope hon. Members will make. they will make the right decision when I have h chance to seek to persuade them to come in my di rather than that of the majority of voices in the d

The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), n Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys W and others have talked about possible changes pattern of national benefits and insurance in the which we are not addressing today. I am su Ministers, not just those in the Department, will re interest the points made and will take them into a in looking at future policies.

Some hon. Members today have said that the forward to a radical look at child benefit, but that q is not before the House this evening; it is simply w we should index-link the benefit. Listening to some contributions, one would have thought it was a choice between index-linking the benefit or abolis That issue is not before the House.

I understand the depth of feeling on the subjec am sorry, having listened to many of the contrib that I have to ask hon. Members to reject the new I emphasise—I hope this is common ground—th is not because the Government do not take serious any way underestimate the importance of improv help available to families; quite the contrary. Reco has been given by Government and Opposition M to the efforts of the Government on that front. We propose to increase child benefit next April un uprating order, but we are putting far more than it cost to uprate the benefit into help for families. T been acknowledged widely in the debate.

The benefit is unique in that it is paid directly mother. It is worth reminding the House that the credit system, which will replace FIS when it com operation in April, will be paid to the mother. Th Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) implied that th of the family credit scheme had somehow been erc the Government. The value of family credit for an earner with two children under 11 will be higher terms than it was when we came to office in 1979 Members are familiar with the figures. This year uprating of child benefit has saved around £120 net. From next April we shall spend around £100 extra on family and income support and over £200 million extra on the family credit scheme. That will be paid directly to mothers.

There is no dispute in the House about the importance of help for families. Our calculation of the relative importance in the social security system of help for different groups has resulted in extra help for families in the system we shall introduce in April. I hope that hon. Members will recognise that we shall put more into helping families than would have been provided had we uprated the benefit by 30p.

Mr. Robin Cook: I do not know whether I misunderstood the Minister, but I thought he said that the current level of child benefit is higher than is necessary to maintain the 1979 value. If so, I point him in the direction of the answers he has given me in the past two months, which clearly state that if the 1979 value were maintained child benefit this April would have to be £7·80, not the £7·25 it will be.

Mr. Scott: That value is for two children under 11. I cannot give an answer across the whole range, but that is the answer I can give and I am assured that it is correct.

Mr. Cook: I confess that I am puzzled. Perhaps I am being slow in following what the Minister is saying, and perhaps he can assist me. I cannot understand the distinction that he makes between this benefit and others. The benefit is paid at a flat rate and its value will be maintained for all earners or those who earn nothing. The Minister's answer plainly implied that its value would need to be increased by 55p to restore its purchasing power of 1979.

7.30 pm

Mr. Scott: Perhaps we should pursue the statistics later, but I am advised that from 1979, when the Government came to office, the purchasing power of the benefit has been maintained. We may have opportunities to debate the point but I am assured that before 1979, as compared to the present position, the value is higher.

Before I gave way to the hon. Gentleman, I was saying that the Government judged that it was better to use resources in such a way as to help family credit and income supplement for families with children rather than to uprate benefit by 30p. I do not believe that that option should be taken away from Ministers in future. There is an obvious disagreement about how we should spend these resources. Spending them on a general increase in child benefit would mean that help is spread very thinly to around 7 million families. Most of those families would have little or no real need of the extra 30p, although I do not deny for a moment that they might be very glad to have it.

Another major group of families, the less-well-off, that receives income support and family credit would find an extra 30p important and valuable. But those families would not receive it. If child benefit had been increased they would have lost that money from their other benefits. The point that I am making to the House, therefore, is essentially simple. If we wish to do more to help families in real need, child benefit is not the best-directed way of doing so. The costs are huge. In gross terms, an increase of 10p costs £60 million to implement; in net terms it costs £40 million. Most of the extra money will go to those who do not seriously need it.

The Government have taken the view that it is more sensible this year to direct these resources elsewhere. I believe that that option should be available to fu Governments; not to do that would impose inflexib upon future Ministers, and that would be inappropr

I wish to answer the point that was made by sever my hon. Friends and, indeed, by one or two Opposi Members, that in some way the wording in Conservative party manifesto or ministerial statem imposes a moral obligation on the Government to up child benefit in line with inflation. The words "pai now" have been interpreted to mean that year by year benefit will be index-linked. I do not believe that process can be sustained. The Government have n undertaken to uprate child benefit in line with inflat That is also the case with tax allowances and, indeed, o social security benefits. If previous Ministers had inte to do that, I am quite sure they would have introdu measures to that effect.

Sir Ian Gilmour: Will my right hon. Friend then what the words in the manifesto really did mean?

Mr. Scott: The words say that the benefit would be as a universal benefit, tax-free, and to the mother. undertaking has not been changed by anything in year's uprating. I believe that that obligation was rig am sure, bearing in mind the pattern of linking other so security benefits to the RPI, that had there been intention to link this benefit it would have been inclu in the list by one Government or another.

The other point that I wish to make relates t suggestion by the hon. Member for Livingston. He that by referring to our determination to keep the be under constant review we shall put it under cons threat. I do not believe that he can read that into it. right that this hugely expensive benefit should be under constant review, like all other benefits. That is to say that we plan to change child benefit. It simply that in a modern welfare state we have an obligatio ensure that available resources are used to the very effect.

There has been much discussion today ab universality and means testing. The point has been made in the debate that to go entirely for one or othe those systems is unthinkable, but somehow a pragm judgment must be made as to where benefits are nee and the role of means testing. I do not doubt or criti for a moment the points that have been made afternoon about the benefits that flow from universal c benefit. Of course I recognise that such a benefit help families with children, whatever their other resource know that it represents investment in future generati and that the less-well-off are guaranteed some finan help. I know that it is simple to claim, easy to adminis and has virtually a 100 per cent. take-up. I acknowle all those advantages, but it is only fair to put disadvantages into the scales.

It is an expensive benefit costing £4·6 billion a yea present. Much of it goes to comfortably off families cannot in any sense claim to need it. Extra help is available to go to the most needy because resources could otherwise go to them are tied up. Equal benefit to be paid regardless of need. It does not help the poo who receive income support or family credit, because level of child benefit is taken into account in establish entitlement to those benefits. I am simply saying tha balance must be struck. I acknowledge that advantages flow from universality, but there are disadvantages as well. It is right that the House should recognise them.

Mrs. Wise: I have listened to the Minister's list with interest. He has failed notably to grapple with the point that was made on both sides, that child benefit ought to be compared to tax allowances. That is the historic route. Will he now give the House his view about that? Why should tax allowances be index-linked and not child benefit?

Mr. Scott: We have decided to index-link tax allowances as well as some social security benefits. We have not decided to index-link this benefit. I do not believe, as I have said, that we should tie the hands of future Governments about the way in which this resource might be used. I believe that it was right to use the resources this year, for the reasons that I have outlined to the House, for the family credit scheme and as extra help for families with children within the income support scheme, rather than to give a 30p increase across the board.

It would be wrong to listen to the siren voices asking us today to pre-empt decisions for a future that we cannot foresee about the allocation of resources. Therefore, I ask the House to reject the new clause. My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) asked us to make sure that we got this right for all time and had a comprehensive review. It would be bold to say that we could do that, but we are determined to see that the considerable sums of taxpayers' money that are provided for social security are used increasingly to help those most in need. It would not be serving that aim well if we accepted the new clause tonight.

Mr. Robin Cook: I shall respond briefly to the Minister. I am happy to correct his recollection of the Conservative party manifesto. It says that child benefit will continue to be paid as at present, which is not what he quoted to the House. Apparently, we are now to take that commitment as being strictly literal arithmetically. I think that the Minister would accept that many who read the manifesto would form a quite different conclusion, that it meant that the value of child benefit would be maintained as at present.

We have had an excellent debate. I am confirmed in that view because our side—and by "our side", on this occasion, I include all those who have spoken in support of new clauses 2 and 4—won handsomely. There were nine speeches in favour of one or other of the new clauses, or both of them, and three speeches against them. Therefore, I hope the House will forgive me if I savour the moment when I am winning before the Division bells ring and we are clobbered in the Lobbies.

There was a curious feature to the debate. It was substantially a debate for and against child benefit. Those who are tempted to follow the Minister into the Lobby tonight to vote against both new clauses should reflect that they will find themselves in the company not only of the Minister but of hon. Members who have spoken explicitly against child benefit and who plainly would favour its abolition. Until the Minister spoke, no one spoke in favour of keeping child benefit but not uprating it. I can understand why no hon. Member felt able to commit himself to that proposition because it is no intellectually. There is no point in saying that case for retaining the benefit but that that ca sufficiently strong for the value of the bene maintained.

I admired the speech of the hon. Member for and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson). She mad convincing case which, were I a Conservative, w persuaded me to vote for new clause 4. I indicate of dissent from her proposition. She said that it we had a general debate on child benefit. I an have to say to the hon. Lady that we seem to general debates on child benefit at two-year int some time. It was only in 1984 that the previous of State for Social Services put child benefit melting pot in his review, had an exhaustive exa of it and at the conclusion of that examinatio admittedly through gritted teeth, that child bene a useful function and should be retained. I am that any open, thorough investigation of chi would come to precisely the same conclusion Members have come to in the debate—that it purpose well and there is no more effective way o the cost of children or of breaking the poverty

What was interesting about the debate Conservative Benches, because the debate was on those Benches, was that it turned on the dual with which some Conservative Members appr benefits as distinct from tax allowances. I thou beautifully caught in the intervention of the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. G the speech of the hon. Member for Lewisham, Maples). After that intervention the hon. M Lewisham, West found it possible to say a f word for the married man's tax allowance.

Perhaps I could advise the House of the c married man's tax allowance, because I nippe checked with the Library. I am advised by the Li in the last financial year, 1986-87, the total co allowance was £4,450 million and in the same total cost of child benefit was £4,550 millio exactly the same. I cannot for the life of me u why it should be regarded by some Conservative as perfectly right and just that through the tax should make available £4,500 million to marri support their wives but wrong that through t system we should make available £4,500 mothers to support their children.

The argument for the one applies to the Conservative Members do not appear to be sayi married man's tax allowance is not the best way poor men to support their wives, or that it is there should be such a tax allowance because it Duke of Westminster and gives him help which h need to support the Duchess of Westminst arguments are not advanced in relation to th man's tax allowance, yet in effect that allowa progressive than child benefit. At least, child b goes to those who are too poor to pay tax and in the hands of those who fall below the tax th

I make a prediction. Were Conservative Me wish to see the phasing out of child benefit— that not uprating the benefit is the way of pha —successful in securing its abolition it would matter of time before the Chancellor of the Exchequer was obliged to re-invent child tax allowances. If he did not do so, we would be about the only country in the western world which gave no help through the benefit system or the tax system to people with children.

The moment the Chancellor came back with such a proposal we would once again be faced with a system that would be less equitable than child benefit because it would put money in the hands mostly of those with the highest incomes and would not put money in the hands of those on the lowest incomes who do not pay tax. That would be less satisfactory as a way of supporting the cost of children because, by and large, it would put money in the hands of the male rather than the mother.

Child benefit is much the best way of meeting the cost of children and breaking the poverty trap. We should keep child benefit. Hon. Members who have heard the clear threat to child benefit in the debate would be well advised to join us in the Lobby and make sure——

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams rose——

Mr. Cook: No, I am concluding my speech. I am so sorry; I did not see that it was my colleague. Of course, I shall give way.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I have been advised that the effects of new clause 1 and of new clause 4 would be precisely the same. In the circumstances, I think it would not be in the interests of the House, and hon. Members would not thank me, if I insisted on their coming back later to support new clause 4. Therefore, I would like to take the opportunity of recommending to those who feel as strongly as I do about this to vote for new clause 1. If they do not feel able to do that, let them at least abstain. If they do not feel able even to do that, let them write a very strong letter to the Minister, as I hope they will do.

Mr. Cook: As the majority of speeches have come from the Conservative Benches, we will withdraw new clause 1 and will divide on new clause 4. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): We now come to new clause 2.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. May we be told whether you intend to give us an opportunity to vote on new clause 4?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Certainly there will be an opportunity to divide on new clause 4, but we can deal with new clause 4 only when we have got new clause 2 out of the way.

New Clause 2

Attendance Allowance for Children Under Two

'In section 35(5) of the Social Security Act 1975, at the end there shall be added the words "or any modification which discriminates on grounds of age against severely disabled children under the age of two."'—[Mrs. Beckett.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

We are now on an entirely different matte payment of the attendance allowance. There are st tests which those claiming attendance allowance h satisfy—[Interruption.]

Ms. Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): On a p order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I cannot hear the of my hon. Friend. I shall be able to hear her now, b everyone has stopped speaking.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is the most genuin of order that has ever been put to me in the Chai

Mrs. Beckett: That is not as much of a complin it might seem, given some of the points of order t raised.

As I was saying, there are stringent tests which who claim attendance allowance have to satisfy be can be awarded. I am confident that hon. Memb both sides of the House know of cases where atte allowance has been denied although they might ha that it should have been awarded. Even when the st tests are passed, as again hon. Members on both sid be aware, a substantial period—six months—e before the allowance can be paid. There must sufficient degree of need, a sufficient amount o required and, particularly in the cases of those w physically disabled, a sufficient degree of pain incu those applying for the attendance allowance befor can be any question of the allowance being paid. In for all of that six months, the conditions for the have to be satisfied.

Many hon. Members will know, from their exp of their own constituency cases, of people unfortunately, are not as aware as all of us would w the circumstances in which attendance allowance claimed or of the fact that they may be entitled to who make late, sometimes very late, claims. I sometimes people have had a degree of pain and su and need not just for months but for years, and appli for attendance allowance is made so late that the on account of whose illness it could be paid dies bef award can come through.

There are stringent tests of eligibility for this pa and of the period before such a payment can be ma months is a very long time for someone to endu degree of pain, if those are the circumstances of his illness. It is a long time for the individual and those s to care for that individual to endure that degree o without the financial support and what must in circumstances be the comparatively small amount o that attendance allowance may provide.

There is one small group—small in every sense word—who, whatever degree of pain or need th experiencing, have to wait not six months, but two Children under the age of two can never, as the law s receive attendance allowance. They may well be, ar number of cases certainly are, ruled out also for a range of other benefits.

Partly because resources are always under pressu indeed, under this Government are declining, the res available to social services committees of local auth and other groups which may seek to alleviate the pro of those in these circumstances are and will alw allocated on the basis of priority. Choices always h be made and when there are cuts those choic inevitably harder and the degree of considerati priority is all the greater. In a very high percentage of cases, although not invariably, as the Minister is, I know, well aware, the definition of priority used is that of entitlement to other benefits, such as attendance allowance. Those who cannot qualify for attendance allowance, by definition, also often cannot qualify for the other help that might be available.

The argument for the cut-off age of two is based on the development of a normal child, but no normal child of any age could possibly receive an attendance allowance because, apart from the criteria to which I referred at the outset, which every person who applies for attendance allowance must meet, no child can be awarded attendance allowance unless his or her attendance needs are "substantially in excess of that normally required by a child of the same age and sex".

It is absolutely clear, as the Minister has admitted, that some children do fit that definition; they do experience not only the degree of need that would be required for an adult to pass those tests but a degree of need substantially in excess of that experienced by any normal child below the age of two.

There is no logic, justice or compassion in denying children who can pass those existing serious hurdles the payment of attendance allowance merely because when that attendance allowance was first placed on the statute book some 12 years or so ago it was thought right to have a qualifying age of two. The case does not stand up for a second to the serious examination which I am sure it is going to receive at the hands of my hon. Friends, and perhaps of hon. Members on the Government side.

We believe that the case which is being made for the removal of that arbitrary age barrier, that third hurdle for small children and their parents, is something that the House should have considered long ago and that this new clause should be carried tonight.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): As my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) has mentioned, this is the first time for a decade and a half that the full House has had the chance of debating and voting on whether there should be a lower age limit below which an attendance allowance cannot be made to someone with severe mental or physical disabilities. There have been plenty of questions during that period, particularly in the last three or four years, but tonight we have a chance to debate the reasons why the Government believe that the attendance allowance, which they accept should be paid to people over the age of two with disabilities which in many cases can be assessed well before that age, cannot be paid to those children.

As hon. Members who served on the Standing Committee will be aware, my involvement in this issue began late last year when the grandparents of two young constgirls who are now 22 months old—Vicky and Alex Storer — wrote to me to describe the enormous difficulties the twins face. The family lives in the constituency of the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens), who is present in the Chamber and who I hope will be supporting this new clause not only in a speech but also in the Lobby. The enormous difficulties with which that family has to cope because of the severity of Vicky's and Alex's disabilities could not fail to move any Member of the House who met the children. The children, with their parents and their aunt, were in the H today in order to publicise the need for this be carried.

From birth, the disability was clearly dia attendant consultant paediatrician, the medical officer for the area. Vicky and Alex much in the first 22 months of their life— brain drainage, fits and frequent resuscitati the social and medical evidence indicates t second birthday they will clearly get th allowance, which by April will be a maxi week. But why do they have to wait? Wh attendance allowance be paid to them now

As a parent, with two of my three childr age to Vicky and Alex, one eight months and years old, I have direct experience of the no of and attention demanded by infants. But recently, conjuctivitis, nightly feeding, and be compared with the strain of coping with the degree of disability that Vicky and Ale like them suffer. For the first few months they required permanent hospital care. It m fact that their mother, Sandra, was formerl nurse at the Walsgrave hospital in Coventr her sister, is currently a nurse at that hospi them to cope, but the strain has certainly t

A £33 attendance allowance would occasional professional help. It would allo Peter, the girls' father, to do the shopping an jobs, confident that the children were bein looked after. The job of looking after chil degree of disability ought to be carried out basis by a district health authority or a l social services department, and there is som from that direction. But some of the main months has been from the Crossroads ca scheme, which in the midlands provides carers looking after people with disabil successive cuts in the funding of the loc health authorities have made them unable bairns and families like the Storers.

Because the lower age limit is two years allowance and five years for mobility all bairns are denied access to other things. For parents cannot get an orange badge to put enable them to use parking spaces for the hospital, outside the council offices, by wherever it may be. So what Sandra and Pe is not only to cope with two disabled bair carry an oxygen cylinder and resuscitati sometimes as much as 100 yards to get to w to go.

8 pm

Another consequence of their being attendance allowance is that from April— because of the changes in social security p are going through — there will be a premium which we understand will be abou Only those who currently or by April rece or mobility allowance will be entitled to that premium. The premium covers the axing of that families now receive, such as help wit or with laundry; this assistance will be r disabled child premium. But families with children under the age of two will not be entitled to the premium because they are not getting an attendance or mobility allowance.

Every hon. Member present in the Chamber or who reads the debate tomorrow in Hansard will know of similar cases in his or her area of children suffering from Down's syndrome, spina bifida, autism, strokes at birth or respiratory, cardiac or intestinal malfunction. I asked the Minister to give us his own assessment for today's debate of how many children under the age of two might be eligible for the new allowance, were the House to pass the clause this evening, but unfortunately those figures have not arrived in time for the debate, so I have to make my own estimate.

Let us say that about 10,000 or 12,000 children could be affected. Shortly before Christmas, the Minister gave me an estimate of the cost of extending provision to these children as about £17 million per year. My only comment on the size of that figure is that it is slightly less than half what it cost to refurbish the offices of the Minister, his Secretary of State and his colleagues across the road from 10 Downing street, that palace with its crystal chandeliers costing £38 million. Half that sum would have provided thousands of families with minimal financial assistance to allow them some extra professional help.

I have been in the House nearly five years, and during that time we have heard a lot about the Tory programme for returning people to the community, particularly when it comes to closing down some of the Victorian hospitals for those with mental handicap or mental illness. There is an element of that in this debate. Sandra and Peter Storer are doing the job of the hospital service. If those bairns were in hospital, they could be costing the taxpayer about £200 a week for professional care. Sandra and Peter are doing that job because they love their family, yet they are not even getting this £33 a week which would help them to cope. It is a cruel hoax for the Tories to speak about returning people to the community as if it was a benefit to the families concerned and then not to provide resources to enable those families to cope.

When we debated this matter in Committee on an amendment which allowed us to raise roughly the same subject matter, the Minister said:

"I have some sympathy for some of the points made by the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East".

He said that the argument that we were putting forward was "more difficult to resist, although the Committee should consider long and hard before accepting" the amendment.

One of the reasons that he gave, and I accept it entirely, was his own personal experience. He said:

"During the past two years, in my extended family I have had experience of a child who suffered from meningitis soon after birth and who will be severely handicapped for the rest of her life. She is approaching the age of two, when she will get the attendance allowance."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 17 November 1987; c. 62.]

Later in the debate, the Minister said,

"The intention in Amendment No. 17 to remove the age limit of two years has a strong, obvious and immediate appeal to anyone who is concerned with handicapped children and the stress . . . that is felt by families, particularly mothers." —[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 19 November 1987; c. 77.]

I quite accept that, with his own experience, the Minister can see the scope of the problem. This leaves me with a simple question. If he understands it from his own experience, why will he not stand up at the Di and extend the entitlement allowance, the co which, as my hon. Friend the Member for D has said, are stringent, to the 10,000 or 12,0 who are undergoing this same experience?

The reason that the Minister gave the Com why the Government did not take this positio "it is difficult to make assessments for children u of two . . . all of us who have children under th have to give them a degree of care and attention almost certainly lead us, if they were older, to attendance allowance for much if not all the time children guaranteed that never once in two years and I have an uninterrupted night — they w constantly interrupted — but the brother afterwards gave us two years of absolute peace, s pattern even in the demands that normal healthy on their parents during the night." — [Offic Standing Committee E, 17 November 1987, c. 69

I can accept that from my own experience two years. But the children who are diagnosed by all medical and social experts as unlikely from conditions suffered from birth—such as Alex—do not fall into the mould which th described of normal children of a similar age. the normal pattern of parents looking after chi not have to carry round an oxygen cyl resuscitation equipment, nor did I have to chec every two hours during the nights that I ha home, and neither did the Minister. But t experience of Peter and Sandra Storer and of of parents like them.

In that larger number of 10,000 or 12,00 there is a group of children to which I would li attention. There can be absolutely no doubt from birth, they will face horrifying proble perhaps tragically short lives. I refer to those from inherited blood disorders such as sickle s or thalassemia major and related haemoglobin I am grateful for the assistance that I and my have been given on this by the Organisation for Anaemia Research—OSCAR. Sickle cell ana inherited disorder of red blood cells affecting pe forebears lived in those parts of the world wh is a scourge.

It is estimated that there are 4,500 suffe United Kingdom, most of whom live in conurbations. Neither I nor the Minister who will reply to has any personal experience of this in rega children such as was mentioned in Committee.

of caring for children is completely different from the upbringing of normal children. There is no cure for sickle cell anaemia. Prophylactic measures include regular penicillin and occasional blood transfusions, high oral fluid intake, warm clothing, well heated rooms and remedial treatment when the painful crises may necessitate hospital admission or day-and-night nursing at home.

I could spend some time describing how all this affects not only the children who suffer from the disorder but their parents and their siblings but, as one would expect with that degree of disability, the effects are also economic and social and impinge on the quality and continuation of family life. The family and the marriage may break up because of the instability brought into the situation by a child with that degree of suffering. Even if the attendance allowance were to be paid, its present level is inadequate. Nevertheless, there would be an element, particularly for children under two, of respite and care available to minimise the effect on the family—although I stress that it ought to be the job of the district health authority or local authority to provide proper 24-hour care for parents and children in that position.

Let me describe a point that was raised in Committee to illustrate the continuation of care that is needed for those who suffer from such conditions as thalassemia major. One of the ways to alleviate the condition partially is by using a drug called, I believe, Desferal, but that drug must be administered over an eight or 10-hour period, several times a week, to children — particularly very young infants—with a hypodermic needle inserted in the stomach overnight. That necessitates the parent constantly getting up to check not only that the baby is all right, but that the needle has not worked itself free from the stomach.

That seems to me to satisfy all the criteria — even with the Government's extended restrictions—for those who need constant supervision. From the age of two, the child — or, rather, the parent — would receive the necessary financial assistance, but the problem is occurring now, and it does not start at the age of two.

It would have been possible, even with the time allocated to tonight's debate, to give a wider range of examples of the problems experienced by the families of a few thousand children in this country who are so severely disabled and face such serious problems that that minor amount of money—£33·00 a week, from April—could provide some degree of alleviation. I trust that my comrades who speak later in the debate will be able to give further examples. However, there has been no serious attempt in the past decade and a half to change the law, and there has been no attempt during the Committee stage to justify the Government's position.

I hope that I am not stealing the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Ms. Primarolo), who pointed out that no research had been undertaken to justify the Government's decision that the allowance should start at the age of two. We are discussing children in whom the diagnosis can be made — because of a disorder in the blood, or because of the severity of their physical or mental disability from birth — that their problems will be with them for the rest of their lives, which in many cases are tragically short. There can be no justification for the Government not cough up a minimal amount such as £1 families of such children.

Certainly, I hope will be given to their case in the day Sandra, who raised this case, a grandparents, recognised when they fi in the autumn of last year that March be two years old, was probably too ea the law. Mrs. Beckett: Does the hon. Gentl that—sadly, in my view—it is now n a Labour Government were in office; and, secondly, that nothing would have given us greater pleasure than to be in a position as a Labour Government to carry out precisely this measure? I am 100 per cent. certain that, as an Opposition Back Bencher, the hon. Member would have received a quite different hearing from me, or from anyone else in the position of Minister for Social Security, from that which, sadly, we expect from the Conservative Benches tonight.

Mr. Boswell: I am grateful for the hon. Lady's comments. However, she will be surprised to learn that, even as a new Member, I know enough not to dive into the realms of the hypothetical. I can, however, record that that was the position under the previous Administration. That was a few years ago, and we hope that matters will improve, but we find what is happening tonight remarkable.

It is perhaps part and parcel of the tactics that have been deployed on the Standing Committee, and on other occasions, by the Opposition that the cost of this change is relatively small. The figure that I pencilled in was £13 million. I understand from the Minister that it is now some £17 million—although, as those of us who have worked in advising Government in previous capacities know, even £10 million, or indeed, £1 million, is fought over in departmental budgets nowadays.

If we had a self-denying ordinance from the Opposition that this was the one area in which they were prepared to interest themselves, and that they would, as the Americans say, major on it, that might be one thing. But when it is accompanied by all other issues with which I have much less sympathy — what may be termed consistent, constant and strident ululation, together with the ruthless clocking up of the taximeter of cost—I part company with the Opposition.

During the Committee stage, I busied myself by attempting to keep some record of the overall costs. I found that the cost of the seven items that I could identify exceeded an additional £700 million a year. When I added the uncosted or unquantifiable items, the figure was well over £1 billion a year. What is proposed tonight on that narrow issue must be seen in the context of the general commitment to what I can only call irresponsibility.

The other reason why I have reservations about the new clause is that I believe that there is sense in not merely following the present practice with attendance allowance. We should be looking, as the Government are looking, at the whole aspect of disability. I say that not to put it off, but to try to achieve the right solution. It is easy for us to consider distressful situations that apply to children and say, "Let's do something about them. What's the most obvious and available measure we can adopt? Let's do it." That may not be the right way to proceed and I will explain why.

I want to consider the specifics of the issue. I listened with great care to the debate in Committee and to the Minister's sensitive reply to the points.

Mrs. Beckett: Rubbish.

Mr. Boswell: I am sorry that the hon. Lady feels that that is rubbish. I seem to remember that at the time the Minister was treated with respect because he went out of his way—and he can speak for himself on this—to respond sensitively to the points that were made.

The Minister said in Committee that he would respond to these points and consider how to deal with them later. First, he will have to consider whether it is possible reliably to assess those children under the age of 24 months, but, in practice, before whom there will be a six months waiting period, it is possible to assess a sufficient proportion of them so as not to create an undesirable degree of disparity of treatment between one class and another. Secondly, how to produce a reasonably satisfactory assessment so that children can be assessed before the 24 months so that attendance allowance can be paid at the age of two years or before, no one would welcome more than I. I hope that the Minister will consider carefully whether that can be achieved. A situation in which only a handful of cases might be so assessable and all the others would follow later might be invidious.

I know that the Minister spent some time and effort in considering the next point. Even if an assessment can be made—and I feel instinctively that it is one which we could perhaps over the years consider more closely—would it be possible to make a practical judgment about the level of extra care required for the under-two position? I hope and believe that it would be possible to isolate some cases where one could clearly say that care was required as the needs were great and that we could then meet such cases in due course.

Finally, as attendance allowance is the only benefit as the passport to other benefits or available at all, even if the final decision is not to opt for attendance allowance in those cases, will the Minister consider whether some way can be found to achieve a passport for severely disabled children? I very much agree with the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) on the point that is clear to all hon. Members who have heard or considered the matter that there are many parents who We are grateful as parents that most of our children have spared such cases. We would like to help those who are involved. In the sense of the debates that have taken place, I want the Government to consider this one of the matters of the highest priority, if not immediately, in the future.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I agree with the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) on the matter. This debate is similar to a fairly lengthy debate we had in Committee, although the wording of the new clause is different. I am glad that we have had the intervention from the Conservative Benches. The Committee stage would have been more worthwhile had it been possible to have a proper debate on the issues in front of the Committee. Conservative Members were tightly bound and gagged by their Whips and could not play a constructive part in the debate.

The hon. Member for Daventry has made a good speech and it is worthwhile for me to attempt to respond to it. First, he said that it was not reasonable to raise the matter because the Labour Government had not considered it 10 years ago. The fact that the Labour Government did not consider it is no reason why a Conservative Government or a subsequent Labour Government should not consider it. If the Labour Government were to restrain themselves to only what Labour Governments have done presumably Conservative Members would not agree with everything that their Government were doing. The hon. Gentleman's argument was very superficial.

He allied with that point the cost of the total proposals put forward in Committee for improving the lot of disabled people and others. He said that it was approximately £1 billion. Yes, that is a lot of money, but it is only about half of what would be produced by reducing income tax from 27p to 25p in the pound. At a time when that is being actively canvassed and discussed, I should have thought that a reasonable alternative use of those resources—even if not what the hon. Gentleman called "economically responsible"—would certainly have a social responsibility far in excess of its economic cost. Indeed, the small element of £20 million for those children out of £1,000 million is money well spent. Even if the rest of the package is expensive and unacceptable, that is no reason for cutting out the one element which may appeal to the hon. Gentleman. Therefore, I reject his argument on that point as well.

The hon. Member for Daventry referred to the need to assess below the age of 18 months and said that there is a danger of discrimination. Of course there is a danger of discrimination. However, discrimination exists now against everyone below the age of two who may well be clearly in need of assistance, and if there were criteria at all, those children would fall within them.

The new clause deals with discrimination. We are currently discriminating against people who clearly should receive some kind of assistance. There are many people over the age of two, including the elderly, whose condition is nothing like as severe as that of some children to whom reference has been made today. It would have been a lesser discrimination to have an ability to pay an allowance before the age of two against a set of criteria. That set of criteria may need to be slightly different because of the kind of children we are talking about and because of the normal pattern of "expected burden" of any children below the age of two. However, surely it is as possible to produce a set of guidelines for those circumstances as it is to produce guidelines for older people. After all, people aged 80, 90 or 100 may be expected to need care and attendance allowance is paid in those circumstances. It should also be practically possible to pay such an allowance for those under the age of two.

The hon. Member for Daventry said that, even if it was possible to make an assessment, it would be difficult to determine the need for extra care. With respect, that question arises in all cases of attendance allowance. No one type of care is needed. Circumstances vary from category to category. We all have constituents who receive attendance allowance and we are pleased about that, although sometimes we think that their cases may be marginal. Others patently need the allowance.

The hon. Member for Daventry said that he was going to make four points, yet I have commented on five that he made. He referred to the passport question. I accept that if there were other ways of getting a passport to other benefits including invalid care allowance which may be passported by attendance allowance, that would be a way out of the hon. Gentleman's argument. However, we are not considering them tonight. We are debating a new clause to try to ensure that we make provision for those children below the age of two who place an extra cost and burden on their parents way beyond the normal responsibility of minding children at that age.

We won the argument in Committee overwhelmingly. In fact, there was not a lot of argument because the Minister agreed with us half the time. I suspect that we will win the argument tonight. I want to remind the Minister briefly of the points rehearsed in Committee which have not been adequately answered. I believe that the Minister acknowledges that extra costs are involved. Therefore, it is a question of getting a mechanism to help parents. There are also extra burdens for the parents of children below the age of two if there is a disability in that when that disability is first diagnosed—and that is likely to be around the age of one — parents will be going backwards and forwards on day trips to hospitals and will incur considerable extra costs. At a later stage they may have some stability in looking after their children, but at the point of diagnosis when they are uncertain about how to cope the extra cost can be even greater than it will be later.

The Minister did not respond in Committee to the question of how there could be objective attendance allowance assessment for older people. If the needs of older people who qualify for attendance allowance can be taken as a barometer, surely it must be possible to devise a system to meet the needs of those below the age of two.

8.30 pm

In Committee we dealt with the issue of community care, or the lack of it. The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) mentioned the absence in many areas of services that give adequate support to parents with disabled children below the age of two. If those services are not available through the local authorities or the area health authorities, the least that we can do is to give them some flexibility to buy into those services by having such resources. We are not talking about an enormous sum of money, or an enormous departure from principle. We are talking about an area in which at the moment the Government are not looking very bright. I should have thought that, in the case of young disabled children below the age of two, the Government would seek a way forward in which their performance could be seen to be a little more creditable than it has been recently. On that basis, I suggest that the new clause be accepted.

Mr. Lewis Stevens (Nuneaton): I had not recognised how serious and sad was the case of many young children until that of Mr. and Mrs. Storer and their twins occurred in my constituency, about which the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) has reminded the House. It was so tragic for those parents to be sure at that early stage that they would have difficulties with their children almost from birth and for many years to come, with little likelihood of any substantial relief or improvement.

Like other people, I consider children and babies to be problems for any parents. It is not easy for all parents for several months. Outsiders do not readily recognise that children may have physical or mental difficulties. When one looks a little more deeply into the real difficulties which such parents must undergo, one realises that almost from the moment that those children arrive home there can be no normal family life. The family is committed to providing children or babies with the basic necessities—feeding them, looking after them, playing with them and enjoying them—but to disabled children they must be totally committed, which prevents the family from having any normal relaxation.

With babies, at least one can relax for an hour or two when they are in bed. In the sad case of Mr. and Mrs. Storer and their children, there is little opportunity for the family to relax unless someone else takes over. That is when there is need for an attendance allowance. It would provide some relief for the family and enable it to have some physical and mental relaxation and carry on a normal life. They need some recreation so that they can give that tremendously full commitment to their children.

In general, there is an age limit of 18 months plus six months, or two years. It is easy to see how such an arrangement could come about. If one examined statistics and drew a distribution curve to show how difficulties with children come into that curve, one would see that many ailments, illnesses and disabilities are recognised at about 12 months. At that stage it is certain that those disabilities really exist and will continue. In cases such as that of Mr. and Mrs. Storer, those disabilities were recognised when the babies were in hospital, and certainly as soon as they came home there was little doubt. A very well qualified consultant, a lady who does not exaggerate and who does not unnecessarily alarm people, even politicians, as some doctors may do — she is a very realistic and understanding person—said that from a very early stage it was possible to know that those children would undergo physical and mental disabilities which would create problems for the family.

We must look for a way to give support to such families from the earliest possible time. That time may be a few weeks or a few months after they are born. Perhaps we should apply a rule of six months, as we do for the attendance allowances, as that would still bring the time available for payment well forward of two years. We should consider that.

The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East spoke about the availability of support, whether through attendance allowance or other support. Help should be available directly when those families take the babies home. In my constituency case I had the impression that help was not quickly forthcoming. It was not easy for the parents to find out that help was available.

Even if it is a matter of attendance allowance, one must look at similar cases and different disabilities and ensure that there is medical or social help automatically available to those families and that at an early stage there is somewhere for them to turn to. There are many services available in Britain. I shall not make any political point about how good or bad they are, but they are available. Yet it is not easy to say where help should come from for such families at the time mentioned by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), the age at which the diagnosis first comes about. Families are taking their children to the hospital to find out about their disabilities. Once they have been properly diagnosed and confirmed, some action can be taken and some procedure put in place to look after those children. But until that time, those weeks and months are desperate times and families have more concern during the time of uncertainty than when the diagnosis is confirmed and they recognise that they have practical difficulties.

I raised that point on Second Reading, partly in the hope that as the Bill went through Committee the matter would be debated. I was not able to serve on the Standing Committee, but I am sure from the words of the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East that it was debated. Indeed, there was sympathy from the Government Benches for an improvement in help—perhaps through the attendance allowance. It is obvious from the Bill that there will not be a Government amendment stating what changes should be made.

I shall be interested to hear my hon. Friend the Minister's response. The new clause seeks to ensure that a family receives support from an early stage and that is right. However, I understand that it may well cause problems in its practical application and in providing adequate support in different cases. My hon. Friend might suggest that various reviews are taking place to try to define more precisely the needs of disabled people in general which may also cover the needs of young children and that the objective of the new clause may be achieved better at a later stage in the Bill or in a subsequent Bill.

Such explanations I shall listen to. However, I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to say that the Government intend to provide cover for the type of cases to which I and the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East have referred and the many others that might exist. I hope that he will say that the Government intend to review support available both in the form of attendance allowances and by other means, and to bring forward measures to assist such cases at an appropriate point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) spoke about a time when that might happen, and I hope that it will be in months, not years. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will reassure me that the Government intend in the near future to introduce measures to provide full and proper support for families with children under two years of age as soon as their disabilities are properly diagnosed. If he does, it may well be that I can support the Government, and not the new clause. Without such an assurance, I shall be tempted to support the clause.

Ms. Primarolo: I want to try to answer some of the points that have been made and to draw the debate back to the essential problem that the new clause seeks to address.

It is regrettable that the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) sought to introduce financial considerations and to calculate how much the Opposition proposals added up to. He may not need reminding, but I shall do so all the same, that each amendment is voted upon individually and he can support this proposal without supporting all the others, although obviously we would wish him to do so. Parents with disabled children do not want sympathy from the House. Sympathy is not enough. Understanding is not enough. It is cheering, but it does not help them.

The hon. Member also asked whether we need some complicated formula to work out whether a child under two requires an attendance allowance. Such a formula already exists in the Bill to work out how everybody else qualifies for an attendance allowance.

Mr. Boswell: Will the hon. Lady accept that the issue is not whether there is a formula in being, but whether it is appropriate to the special situation and the areas of uncertainty which were rightly identified in Committee in the assessment of the need for and the level of special care for such children? That is the issue on which we await the Minister's reply.

8.45 pm

Ms. Primarolo: I do not remember the Minister addressing that point in Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) referred to the proposed changes to the Abortion Act 1967 and the fact that it is possible to diagnose hereditary diseases and severe abnormalities before birth. It is possible to work out from that whether a child will require more care than a normal able-bodied child under two.

It is obviously correct that a Labour Government allowed the age bar. It should not have done so, and I hope that the Labour party is now big enough to admit that and to say that the next Labour Government will change it. Comments were made in the previous debate on child benefit about the value that our society places on children and on understanding their needs. I hope that that is greater now than it was 10, 15 or 20 years ago.

This matter was raised with me by my constituents in September of last year and I wrote to the Minister to ask why there was an age bar. The age bar says that even if a child has all the disabilities that would qualify him for an attendance allowance at the age of three, if he is under two, he is disqualified. That age bar has nothing to do with an assessment of a child's needs. The Minister said that clearly in his reply to me of 14 September when he said:

"Unfortunately, a line has to be drawn somewhere."

It is an arbitrary line for a cut-off date.

The other main plank of the Government's argument has been that it must be proved that a disabled child under two requires care substantially in excess of that required by a normal child under two. I asked the Library to find out whether any research has been done on the care needed by a child with an inherited disorder or severe disability compared with a so-called normal child under two. There has been no such research. There has been research and statements on the care needed by a so-called normal child and there has been research on disabled children, but no comparison has been made. There has been no evaluation of the differences. The Government have taken refuge exclusively behind the barrier that all two-year-olds require substantial care.

I am sure that those hon. Members who are parents understand clearly the problems of lack of sleep caused by a child who is under two who does not want to sleep through the night. It may be rather like discussing matters here late at night. [HON. MEMBERS: "Much worse."] At least there is the pleasure of one's children and the knowledge that they will grow up into decent members of our society. Such satisfaction is not always the outcome of debates in the Chamber. Indeed, the Opposition have won only one vote so far, and that was in relation to the Post Office.

The basis of the Government's argument is that all children under two require the same amount of care. Therefore, we need to demonstrate that that is not the case. We do not particularly want to read out the endless horror stories of those children and their parents but we must underline the fact that caring for such a child is not the same as caring for a normal under-two-year-old.

I shall give the general outline of a letter that I received about a child born with a hereditary disease which meant that it did not have all its skin. Sufferers from that disease have varying amounts of skin on different parts of their body. Parts of their skin are very thin and are likely to break and blister. It is an extremely painful illness. Those who have had to change nappies can imagine the problems of a child suffering from that disease when it is very young and still requires nappies.

The parents in question wrote to me about their daughter who, unfortunately, lived for only 12 weeks. She had only 30 per cent. of the normal amount of skin. She was in great pain and needed much care. Both parents stayed at home, which put an immense emotional strain on them, especially as they did so in the sure knowledge that the child would die. After eight weeks the parents simply could not cope any longer with the strain of caring for that child 24 hours a day and had to resort to having her put back into hospital care. They did not have the necessary support to relieve them from the exhaustion and deprivation that they were suffering. It seems to me that that experience is not the same as caring for a normal 12-week-old baby. There is a world of difference. The condition is medically known. It can be diagnosed and its effects are known. Age is not a problem in that case.

The work of OSCAR on sickle cell anaemia has been referred to. It is an inherited disease and the symptoms of those suffering from it are well charted. The crises of that illness are particularly acute in children of two and under and drugs have to be administered to those children throughout the night. The crises occur about every six weeks or so and last for several weeks and the child will be in extreme pain and discomfort during that period. Naturally that is reflected in its behaviour. Clearly, caring for such a child is not the same as caring for a child under two who is teething and in pain.

The Government persist in hiding behind a barrier that is totally transparent. They say that they cannot assess the difference between looking after a severely disabled child and the impact of known inherited diseases on such children, and giving the care and support that a normal child under two requires. The conclusion that I draw from that is that they are mostly men, who have little experience of looking after children and little understanding of the constant demands placed on parents. Therefore, they can say in complete astonishment that they have never thought of the continuous help and care that a disabled child under the age of two would require. Indeed, they have never really thought about how much care a normal child under two needs.

The new clause forces the debate by asking, "Why do we need an age bar at two, which excludes families from claiming attendance allowance despite the social economic and personal strains that caring for such a child puts on them?". Why do we need the age bar when we can assess the illness and when we can assess whether or not an attendance allowance is necessary under the legislation already? It is already difficult to qualify for such an allowance. As there is already a method of assessing diseases, and medical opinion that can forecast their progress, why do the Government persist in keeping the two-year age bar? The answer must be meanness, lack of understanding of the care of children and especially of the care that needs to be given to children who are physically or mentally disabled—who have inherited diseases, who are born with spina bifida, who suffer a stroke at birth or who have cleft palates and who need additional care, over and above the care needed by any other two-year-old.

I have attempted to clarify the purpose of the new clause. I sincerely hope that Conservative Members will now say that there is no logical or moral reason why the two-year bar should remain. I hope that they will join us in saying that, while it is regrettable that previous Administrations, of whatever political colour, have failed to address that point, we shall put it right tonight and ensure that the parents receive at least some support, albeit not enough, in recognition of the difficulties that they face in trying to keep their families together and care for their children.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (Wanstead and Woodford): I speak from a position of great luck because I am the father of a 20-month-old child who is healthy and normal. Frankly, the demands of my son are incessant. He needs constant watching, worrying over and caring for, because a 20-month-old son is an extraordinary phenomenon. As his father, I have had to think of 40 different ways in which a lunatic might commit suicide and then prevent him from doing so.

The Government have decided, I believe rightly, that the constant demands made on parents of any child under the age of two are never-ending. They have also admitted — as I admit — that in practice the parents of handicapped children sometimes have greater needs than the parents of normal children, and that those needs are unmet. However, it becomes much easier to assess those needs when the child is about two—as well as the extra time taken by the parents and the extra costs that they incur in meeting the needs. Inevitably, the younger the child the harder it is to assess its needs. The matter cannot be looked at in terms of black and white. It must be a question of balance, as must everything that is discussed in this Chamber.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) was right: it is no argument to say that a previous Labour Government decided that the age limit of two years should be in place, and that therefore this Government must be right. As I have said, the issue is not black and white. However, there is an argument for saying that the previous Labour Government had to weigh up the various different and competing claims on resources and the various different and competing ways of targeting those resources, and that they came to the same conclusion as this Government.

Mrs. Beckett: I know that the hon. Gentleman was a member of the Committee and that he listened to some of the debates, but I remind him of a point made by the Minister—that once the age limit had been introduced at an early stage during the introduction of attendance allowance, the issue of the age limit was hardly raised and has not been considered from that time to this. It is not the case, as the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) have said, that the matter had been considered and rejected by a Labour Government. The initial age limit has not been seriously questioned until now. It is regrettable and terrible that it has not been questioned, but that is not an argument for not questioning it now.

Mr. Arbuthnot: Although I am grateful for that intervention, the hon. Member does not appreciate that the imposition of an age limit requires a positive step. In my view, the positive step to impose that age limit was correct because of the incessant demands that are made on the parents of any two-year-old child.

It is inevitable that resources are limited and, therefore, that those resources must be targeted in one way or another. The way in which those resources are targeted must be a matter of judgment and balance. It is not always possible for a Government to satisfy every unmet need, and it would not necessarily be right for a Government to do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Daventry referred to the fact that the Government are examining the whole system of attendance allowances that are paid to disabled people. It is better to examine those attendance allowances as a whole and for that to be done in the light of the survey of disabled people which is being carried out by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, and which is expected later this year. It is also better that the matter be considered in the light of the study of community care that is being performed by Sir Roy Griffiths. When attendance allowances are dealt with, it is necessary that the final conclusion reached by the House is the right conclusion.

Nobody could deny the effectiveness of the speech by the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms. Primarolo). However, because of the review that is coming this year, the decision must be the right one. It is also necessary that attendance allowances are not looked at——

Ms. Primarolo: What review is the hon. Gentleman talking about?

Mr. Arbuthnot: I refer to the review that is being carried out by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys. Its survey of disabled people is expected later this year.

Ms. Primarolo: That is a general study of disability and does not address specifically the question that we have raised in the new clause—the position of under-two-year olds and babies—for exactly the same reasons that the age bar exists in the first place.

Mr. Arbuthnot: That is precisely the point that I am making. It is a general study. Because the position of disabled people is a matter which must be considered as a whole, that is the more sensible way of dealing with this issue, rather than by the new clause——

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Boswell rose——

Mr. Arbuthnot: I have given way five or six times in my speech already. I would rather wind up my speech by reminding hon. Members that it is not only the attendance allowances which are available to disabled people——

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Arbuthnot: No, I shall not give way. I have done so six times already.

It is not only attendance allowances which are available to disabled people, because the allowances are only one of a whole range of services that are also available——

Mr. Nellist: Will the hon. Gentleman give way? He said nowt for two months in Committee, so will he give way now?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Arbuthnot: There is a specific responsibility on local authorities and on health authorities to help those families which have disabled children. That help can take the form of the provision of equipment, home helps and nursing facilities for other children in the family, among other things.

Therefore, the balance is difficult to strike——

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Arbuthnot: The balance is difficult to strike, but in this case I believe that the Government's conclusion, which coincides with the last——

Mr. Nellist: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I heard the hon. Gentleman say that he was not giving way.

Mr. Arbuthnot: It is a difficult balance to strike, but I believe that the Government's conclusion, which is the same as that arrived at by the last Labour Government, is the correct one.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mrs. Wise: While sitting through the debates on the Social Security Bill in Committee, I used to wish that Conservative Members would speak out. I believed that, once they had heard speeches such as those made by my hon. Friends the Members for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) and for Bristol, South (Ms. Primarolo), they would have to think the same thoughts as I was thinking. Any human being would have done so. I heartily believed that, if they would only throw off the discipline of the Whip and speak, all would be revealed.

Now, I am so shocked at the revelation of the depths of their total lack of comprehension of the problems facing so many people that I regret that they have spoken. I regret having had my illusions shattered. I would rather believe that Conservative Members were bound and gagged by the Whips than that their sensibility and understanding was so limited.

The hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) talked about his child of 20 months needing constant attention. I have a grandchild of 16 months, who of course needs constant attention and supervision. He climbs and is apt to fall over. But there is all the difference in the world between adventureness which requires supervision, with all the joy and laughter that accompany that period of life, and the complete helplessness and sadness occasioned by severe sickness and disability described by my hon. Friends. Possibly, if there were more women Members, even Conservative Members would show more understanding, although I cannot guarantee that, given the shattering of my illusions tonight.

I am sorry that we do not have the same level of attendance in this debate as we had for the child benefit debate earlier. Many more hon. Members were willing to come and talk about the needs of normal families. I welcomed them and took part in that debate, but it is a great pity that those who do not have such force of numbers behind them and do not wield so many votes cannot count on such a turnout. I deeply regret that.

All the arguments that have been used against the new clause tonight could be used equally well against any attendance allowance. We have heard that it is difficult reliably to assess the need. That is at least as—if not more—true of adults. Medical opinions differ about the needs of adults. Some doctors say that an attendance allowance should be given, some that it should not. We do not use that genuine difficulty as a reason for not having an attendance allowance. But when it is a matter of babies, for some reason every judgment must be perfect and the balance must be so delicately attuned that we must never take the risk of tipping it in favour of children or their parents.

I would rather some attendance allowances were giv and later withdrawn because the children improv Unfortunately, in most of these cases, death will be t only relief for the children and their parents. For t House to refuse to give any help that we can to parents such children is diabolical and monstrous. The House Commons should be ashamed of itself tonight if it vo against this amendment.

I can see that I shall have to follow the advice given another hon. Member in Committee and study bo language. Normally I do not interpret body language t listen to what people say. However, from the shuffles a wriggles of Conservative Members it is clear that they fi some of my arguments uncomfortable. At this very min I can see those arguments being shrugged off by th Members.

When we debated child benefit, we were told of huge expense that would be involved in upgrading it. were told that it would cost a lot and that it was a bl instrument. Indeed, one Conservative Member said t that benefit was sprayed all over. However, we are n talking about something that would be finely targete a delicate instrument. The allowance would go to ab 10,000 of those families in this country who have suffe the misfortune of all misfortunes. Now we are told that matter is too complex and that judgments might be m that were not absolutely correct.

In Committee, the Minister — we are told responded sensitively to the problem—said that the h given should be the right type of help. I do not think t giving an extra £31 or £32 to a family so that they can a bit of extra help or a bit of extra rest could possibly the wrong help. I accept that there might be a whole of things that should be done—some of those thi may be dealt with at the moment, but inadequately and it is right that they should be considered and vo upon. What we are being called upon to vote for toni cannot possibly be regarded as the wrong type of help any parent in such a position.

I have heard about the OPCS survey regarding extent of disability and the needs of the disabled. Howe the hon. Members who have mentioned that survey h no knowledge—they certainly have not shared it with —of any specific attempts to study the problems disabled and severely sick babies. Such babies will lumped in with other people.

I believe that those children need extra, urg attention. I happen to believe that, in this amendment, are, if anything, being over modest. There will still be age limit to qualify for the allowance. Those babies t die before the age of 12 weeks will not be covered by amendment. Our amendment still means that th children would have to suffer for six months before t qualified. Therefore, the earliest age for benefit woul six months and it may well be that weeks would before it was understood that a claim could or shoul made. As a result of that claim, an assessment would h to be carried out and therefore it would probably m that few children under the age of one would get benefit.

Even though the amendment represents a s measure, it is still infinitely worth while. I do not k how hon. Members will sleep tonight if they deprive pe of this benefit for the children. I hope that when the h Member for Wanstead and Woodford goes home ton and looks at his 20-month-old child, he will think ab the mother struggling with twins who are unable to stand up unaided and who have to have an oxygen cylinder ready. That mother has to look out for those twins ceasing to breathe. She does not have to watch to see if they fall over and graze a knee, but to check that they have not ceased to breathe. The hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford should look at his 20-month-old son and be thankful that he is not a candidate for the attendance allowance for which we are appealing tonight.

We hear a great deal about sympathy. It has been said that the Minister responded sensitively in Committee and that sympathy poured from him. I am prepared to believe that he genuinely feels that sympathy, but it does not help parents for one minute. They face a burden that goes on minute by minute, hour by hour, 24 hours of the day; and mothers, in particular, face that burden. We could not take it from them. They have been plagued by nature with this dreadful catastrophe. We can only try to alleviate it a little at the edges. The Minister tells us that we may not be able reliably to assess every case, so one person may receive the allowance and another person may not, when they should both receive it.

Words do not often fail me, as my hon. Friends know. I cannot understand how hon. Members, having had these matters brought to their attention, can then throw the argument back. I reiterate what my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) said. The Labour Government did not reject any such proposal. The matter was never considered during the 1970s.

9.15 pm

Mr. Simon Burns (Chelmsford): Before you get carried away with self-righteous indignation, what did you do——

Mr. Speaker: Order. No "yous".

Mr. Burns: I was wondering what the last Labour Government did from 1975 to 1979 to consider this matter and what the Labour party has done while out of office, if it feels so strongly about the matter.

Mrs. Wise: The Labour Government were doing a few useful things, such as introducing mobility allowance and non-contributory invalidity benefit. Many of us were helping them with that.

We did not know that there are 10,000 families in this position. They did not bring the problem to us. Presumably no Conservative Members knew about the problem when they were on the Opposition Benches, because they did not raise the matter. Nobody raised the matter. None of my constituents brought it to my attention. As the problem affects such a small minority of children, it is not surprising. Like the hon. Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), I thought that all babies needed a lot of care, and that therefore the problem did not arise. However, we are aware of the problem now because we have been told about it by the people who suffer, so none of us has any excuse.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I raised this point in Committee on 17 November. I have worked for the Health Service for many years and have nursed such children. A change occurred in the care of these children. I asked the Minister how many beds had gone out of the National Health Service during those years. He gave me an answer which ran into thousands, so there are different trends. The Labour Government did not recognise the problem, but, although there is no excuse for that, there was a different method of caring for children. We cared for children with severe handicaps in hospital. That trend has changed and that is a good argument for bringing forward this amendment.

Mrs. Wise: My hon. Friend is quite right. I take the expression "righteous indignation", which tripped off the lips of the hon. Member for Chelmsford, not as a term of abuse, but as a compliment. Anybody who does not feel righteous indignation at the thought that this amendment might be rejected is deficient in humanity, and as a politician and human being. If the hon. Gentleman's constituents were aware of the facts, they would feel that too. I call on all hon. Members with a grain of humanity and a grain of common sense to acknowledge that there is no financial or moral justification for rejecting this amendment.

Mr. Nellist: My hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) has listened carefully to the debate here and in Committee. It is interesting to note that the interventions from one or two Conservative Members, who sat silently in Committee, should be so derogatory. The only Conservative Member to speak in the debate tonight who has met one of these families—the Storer family — is the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens). He has been the only Tory Member to say that, unless the Minister gives an assurance that there will be some progress, he may support the Opposition. None of the Tory Members who have spoken this evening have gone to the 30 or 40 families in their constituency and asked the parents how they are coping. They are all speaking out of the back of their heads.

Mrs. Wise: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the intervention. I join the call for all hon. Members to vote for the amendment. There is little enough we can do. It would be shameful to refuse to do what little we can.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I should like to pay tribute to the members of the Standing Committee that considered the Bill, because the House has seen the kind of emotional tirade from the hon. Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) that they have had to put up with day in and day out. We have had an emotional tirade time after time, when I would have thought the purpose of the Committee and the House was to consider dispassionately, but with heartfelt attention, the cases of fellow citizens such as those we have heard about tonight.

Let us remember the background to the introduction of the attendance allowance that we are extending to the parents of children under the age of two. That allowance was introduced by a Conservative Government, who paid heed to the needs which were evident in those days, before the magnificent advances in medical science of recent years, when it was extremely difficult to distinguish between those youngsters who had a serious disability that would qualify for the attendance allowance and normal children. That was the reason the Conservative Government introduced the two-year limit, and presumably that was the reason why the succeeding Labour Government—of whom the hon. Member for Preston, the then Member for Coventry, South-West, was a part —did not raise the two-year limit, let alone change it. It is being considered now.

In those days the number of cases of such youngsters was minimal, but thanks to advances in technology and medical science, more children are surviving the weird and terrible conditions that afflict them, and they are the serious cases which hon. Members have quite rightly raised. The hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens) and other hon. Members have referred to cases which prove beyond a shadow of doubt that we should turn our attention to the thousands of children in this condition, because they are worthy of our support.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I ask my hon. Friend to consider the case of handicapped children in care who require fostering or adoption, because it is generally easier to find parents to adopt or foster younger children than older children. This bears out the argument that the need for care of young children is not as great as it is for older children. When funds are short, surely it is more important to provide funds to look after older children, about whom there is more concern and who cause more worry to parents, than to provide funds for younger children who do not require as much care.

Mr. Arnold: My hon. Friend's point speaks for itself. It is all very well for Labour Members to bring in an amendment and make heart-rending speeches in an attempt to overcome in a superficial way what is a very real problem. I would rather that the Minister gave an undertaking that he will consider the problem and will bring together county council social services departments and local district health authorities to consider the problem of providing adequate support and relief for parents of disabled children under the age of two.

Mr. Scott: It is not surprising, in discussing a subject that has so many emotional overtones, that strong feelings have been displayed this evening. We spent 10¼ hours in Committee in three long debates on attendance allowance. I know that all members of the Committee treated it with great seriousness and concern.

Tonight, we return to the matter. Before I get into the main argument that I wish to put, I should like to say to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) that he had a question answered today about the statistics and costs of the matter. I hoped that he would receive it before this debate, and I am sorry if he has not yet done so. I shall give the substance of the answer now, and it will be of some interest to the House.

The hon. Gentleman will recall that in an answer given to him on 30 November 1987, we said that the advice we had was that an estimated 3,900 children currently become eligible at the age of two. Of those, 2,300 were at the higher rate and 1,600 were at the lower rate. Assuming that all those would start at the age of six months, no attempt was made to allow for awards running for only part of the financial year. The resulting estimate of a £17 million extra annual cost included £7·5 million for invalid care allowance and £0·5 million for income support child disablement premium. I emphasise that both of the estimates I am giving to the House now assume the continued application of the six-month qualifying period, that is to say, that no award would start before six months, and that is the basis of the assumption.

We have been able to revise our estimates in the light of expert medical advice about children with severe disabilities from birth, who require attention substantially in excess of normal. We also take into account disabilities that come to light subsequently, particularly duri second year of life. We estimate that there may be 3,000 under-twos who would qualify. They probably divide fairly equally between the highe lower rate allowance. Taking account of dis throughout the year of children coming into bene reaching the age of two, when they cease to be an cost, we estimate an extra annual cost of about £7 m That takes account of £3·1 million for invalid allowance and income support disablement premi £200,000.

Mr. Wigley: The Minister used a telling phrase explanation, which I am sure will be most helpful House. He spoke of children with needs that "substantially in excess of normal". Is that not wh debate in Committee has been about, the inability whether such a group exists? If it does exist an possible to quantify it at 3,000, surely that is abu evidence that the point behind the amendment sho accepted by the Government.

Mr. Scott: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will all to continue. I wanted to clear up that point for the and particularly for the hon. Member for Co South-East, who I anticipate will have had the ans advance of this debate.

Another point that the hon. Gentleman raised speech concerned entitlement to an orange badge, from the attendance allowance. Technically speal flows from mobility allowance, although I know tha local authorities operate the scheme on the basis th a child reaches the age of two it is entitled to allowa then the parents or other carers are entitled to an badge.

Mr. Nellist: If we are unsuccessful this eve convincing sufficient Conservative Members to sup on new clause 2, and in arranging for all under- have attendance allowance, what can the Minister now from the Dispatch Box on this small point ab passport to an orange badge? Will discretion be so that local authorities can issue badges to the pa under-twos, where need is identified, even where a not two years old and cannot qualify for atte allowance, or is not five years old and cannot qua mobility allowance? Will the Minister offer at le concession before we come to the meat of the new

Mr. Scott: I shall leave that to the end of my the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene on an matters, I shall be happy to give way, but we have debate in Committee. As I say, it was a long and debate and obviously a great deal of emotion u many of the contributions. As I promised in Com I have thought long and hard about the propo attendance allowance should be available for under the age of two. I knew that this would b again on Report. I also believe that there was importance about the discussion.

Many points made in Committee caused m Friend and myself to think seriously about the ma I went back to the Department because of the ch put to me and asked for additional expert medica on the medical issues. As a result, I have a clearer some aspects of the argument that perhaps I did in Committee. A lot of this depends on medical Lest I am arousing expectations that I shall not be able to fulfil when I conclude, I still believe for the moment that it would be wrong to include the proposal in the Bill at this time, but I hope to say something more constructive before I finish.

The contribution of the hon. Member for Preston reached perhaps hysterical points but I understand the strength of her feeling. At one time she seemed to be talking as though attendance allowance was the only help available for parents with disabled children. Of course, a range of help is provided by the social services departments, health authorities and voluntary organisations for such families.

Mrs. Wise: Does not that also apply to adults who receive attendance allowance? Do they not also qualify for other allowances?

Mr. Scott: They may indeed. But listening to the hon. Lady one could have been persuaded that families who had the appalling misfortune to have a severely disabled child, with all the emotional and physical stress that that obviously puts on parents and other members of the family, were left helpless because they were not entitled to attendance allowance. The point I am making is that that is not true. Whatever the arguments may be for or against giving attendance allowance to disabled youngsters, the fact is that there is a range of help available to those families. It is right that we should remind ourselves of that.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): The Minister has mentioned the range of help available through local authorities and social services. But many local authorities, such as Sheffield, are rate-capped and the pressure put on social services is far too great. Rate-capping makes the position worse, so the Minister cannot say that someone else should take care of the problem.

Mr. Scott: On the other hand, the allocation for personal social services which has been agreed for the coming year, although not what local authorities might have wished but nevertheless generous, is certainly of a sufficient size for them to be able to agree to implement sections 5 and 6 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 whose author, as it were, is sitting on the Opposition Front Bench. Extra resources have been provided to social services and local authorities. It is not possible for Government to dictate to local authorities how they should spend the allocation. But certainly this range of services is provided by the vast majority of local authorities in this country.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I am very grateful to the Minister for giving way. Despite earlier temptations, I had not intended to intervene because I think that this is a crucial discussion and I did not want to take away from the main focus of what seems to me to be a vital debate. But I am sure that the Minister did not wish to give the impression to the House that the whole of the 1986 Act had been implemented or that any one of the local authority associations is satisfied with progress so far. Can he clarify that point?

Mr. Scott: If the hon. Gentleman had listened carefully he would have realised that I referred to sections 5 and 6 and said that we had enabled them to be implemented with the resources that we have made available for the coming year. We have said that the implementation of the rest of the Act will depend on the resources we are able to make available in future. It is the clear intention that, resources become available, we shall ensure that the who of the Act is implemented.

The main point that I am trying to make at the mome is that families which have this appalling experience a not left helpless. Local authorities have a responsibility assess the needs of all families with children and to ensu that those needs are met. Health authorities have responsibility to provide health services for all childre including those with special needs, and voluntar organisations provide health services which add to t volume of statutory services and widen the range a variety of response to people's needs.

I know very well, and I recognised this in Committe how the parents of handicapped babies find their practic burdens increased by the emotional strain of coming terms with the handicap. I believe that it is vital important that parents receive the right support a counselling to help them with this emotional strain. Ma parents who find themselves in this situation speak ve highly of the help which they are given by heal authorities, hospitals, local authorities and voluntar organisations, many of which work on a self-help basi and this helps families which find themselves in th situation to cope with both the practical burdens and t emotional strains involved.

Mr. Wigley: The Minister will recall that in Committ I went into some detail about the fact that not only is the a need for these services but, over and above that, the is a real additional cost to the parents of disabled childr and that cost is there from the very beginning. Will address himself to that aspect?

Mr. Scott: There are, of course, voluntary organis tions that are able to help with that sort of thing, but I w recome to the point about attendance allowance in moment. I just want to register the point that families this situation have a range of help from a variety of sourc —from the health services, local authorities, domicilia services, and so on.

Mr. Thurnham: I did not have the advantage of bei on the Committee at an earlier stage, but I have heard figure this evening of 10,000 families, and the Minister h just quoted a figure of 3,000 families. My own research Bolton would suggest that about 10 families each ye have a severely handicapped child born to them, whi would suggest that for the country as a whole there mig be between 2,000 and 3,000 each year. I should be grate if my hon. Friend would clarify the numbers.

Mr. Scott: The figure will, of course, be in the Offici Report tomorrow as a result of the answer I have given the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East. It comes o at up to 3,000 children, assessing the total cost, bearing mind that they come on for part of the year, and so o at some £7 million. That includes both the ICA and t child disablement premium.

I think that it is generally accepted that attendan allowance should be paid only in respect of those disabl children whose attendance needs exceed those of norm children of the same age. Giving statutory expression that principle was one of the main purposes of t regulations which were made in 1971 at the outset of t attendance allowance scheme under the power which now contained in the 1975 Act. The age two threshold which this clause seeks to remove has similarly been enshrined in regulations since 1971.

I am not making a party political point at all because there are people on both sides of the House who are concerned about this sort of issue.

Given that this is enshrined in regulations—it is not in primary legislation, so people who wished to raise the matter or to have a debate need not have waited for an opportunity arising from primary legislation — I am surprised, I am even surprised at myself, that none of us spotted this and that it has not been raised earlier. But there has been no concerted pressure at all to amend this particular regulation before now. That is not to say that the Committee and the House are not entitled to use the opportunity of this Bill to bring the matter to public attention. I think I may have used a phrase—whether it was a wise one or not—about exploiting the fact that we had a Bill in order to raise this particular matter, but I did not use it in any pejorative sense. I understand why the Opposition, when we have a Bill of this sort, seize on a matter, bring it forward and have it discussed on its merits—merits which have changed over the years, not least because of the improvements in medical science and medical technology which have enabled many youngsters born with severe disability to survive, babies who would not have survived in the early years of attendance allowance.

We can all understand the original rationale of the lower age limit. It was that healthy babies and infants required a lot of attention anyway and so it would be very difficult in practice to identify any substantial extra need for attention arising from disability. The age of two was chosen as the threshold because the important milestones of normal development occurring by the end of the second year meant that by that age any significant divergence from the pattern of increasing independence would have become apparent. But times change, and we must recognise that. Although this rationale remains true for many children who may grow up disabled, it has been overtaken by developments affecting other children. In particular, the continuing advances in medical and nursing care of babies with severe congenital abnormalities and birth trauma mean that more survive and are discharged into the care of their parents in the first year of life.

The advice that I have received confirms that, as hon. Members argued in Committee, these babies have attendance needs which exceed those of a normal child. That is not to say that it is as easy to assess the needs of a baby as it is to assess those of a child over the age of two; there are still substantial difficulties involved in such a judgment. But it is clear that there is a group whose disabilities and needs it is possible to assess before the age of two. Perhaps it is because the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) recognised that this did not require primary legislation that he asked me in Committee to undertake a specific review of it and to "consider the issue in its own right at the appropriate time". —[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 19 November 1987; c. 82.]

The recent medical advice that we have received and the conclusion from it that I have reported are obviously an important aspect but I do not think that they can be the absolute answer to the issue in this new clause before us today. With the very substantial extension of allowance that we have seen, particularly si women became eligible, we would have to interaction of attendance allowance and allowance in the context of any extension to the age of two. Because it is intended maintenance for those who forgo the opp employment to look after a disabled perso need to examine the merits of paying it to usually the mother, of a child when that paren well have given up work in any case.

In essence, if we are to consider the attendance allowance to youngsters under th who have needs substantially in excess of those child, it is right to look at the interaction o allowance and invalid care allowance, perhaps childhood, and see what an appropriate patt might be. We must look at those above the a well as those below it to ensure that we have e sensible arrangements for this sort of cash disabled children and their parents.

9.45 pm

I have a reply to the hon. Member for Cove East about local authorities and the orange b Local authorities already have discretion to badges to disabled people who are not co automatic entitlement criteria. I understa colleagues in the Department of Transpo responsible for the scheme are conducting a and have sought comments and represent responsible organisations. I am sure that welcome any representations by hon. Membe operation of the scheme. Some authoritie operate the scheme, although some choose allowance and some go below the age to two have the agreement of the hon. Member for

I mention the kind of issues that I think be right for us to consider if we reviewed cas disabled children and their parents withi narrow context of the existing benefits of att invalid care allowances. I do not intend to sp what answers we might come up with if we en exercise, but, as my hon. Friends the M Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthn Daventry (Mr. Boswell) mentioned, s questions are about to be overtaken by the w of attendance allowances, along with oth benefits, that will shortly be made possible of the OPCS survey of disabled people Griffiths' study of community care. They m to significant changes in the form of cas support for disabled people, including child parents, and we shall want to examine their a great deal of care. Sir Roy Griffiths' rep soon, and the OPCS results later this year, wi material for a wider and better-informed deb these matters.

If the hon. Lady is not willing to withd clause, I ask the House to reject it, but background of a recognition that support fo of disabled children throughout the age ra inescapably be part of the system.

Mrs. Beckett: The tone of the Minister's r that I feel confident that many hon. Memb not followed the progress of the debate will b must have made some concession. I congratulate him on managing not to make such a concession while sounding as though he had.

I accept that the Minister has now gone as far as saying that, in the context of the Griffiths report on community care and the OPCS survey of disability in all their aspects, the Government will look seriously at the position of disabled children. I shall do the Minister the justice of acknowledging that I have little doubt that he and, probably, his hon. Friend the Under-Secretary have been seriously dismayed by the observations and cases put to them in Committee, and will take the opportunity of those reviews to do what they can. Nevertheless, we have no firm date for either of those reviews; certainly the general survey of disability has been awaited for a considerable time. With some regret, I must say that it seems to me that all the Minister is saying is that at some time in the future —perhaps this year, perhaps next year or perhaps the year after—when the general survey of the needs of the disabled is made, he will look at such cases and perhaps act.

At least we have heard from the Minister something that we did not hear from his hon. Friends whose views we did not have the benefit of hearing in Committee—although the members of the Committee who have spoken tonight were, I concede, present for most of the debate, which cannot be said for all Conservative Members. At least the Minister expressed an understanding that the debates in Committee and on the Floor of the House have been serious and thoughtful debates, dealing with serious and important issues of causing tremendous anxiety to the parents of children who are, by definition, very severely disabled, whether physically or mentally.

At least in that respect, the contribution from the Government Front Bench is distinguished from that made by the hon. Members for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) and for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) and indeed the comments made by the hon. Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) whom I am not sure is in the Chamber any longer, so disgusted was he by the tone of the debate. Forgive me: how could I forget the contribution made by the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold)? He referred to what Conservative Members had to put up with in Committee. Apparently the hon. Gentleman does not like to listen to the problems of those who have to cope with severely mentally and physically handicapped children. My sympathy for him is considerably tempered by the recollection of the much greater problems faced by those who have to cope with those difficulties.

From the comments made by those hon. Members, it appeared that they were trying to find excuses to explain why they were unable to vote with the Opposition tonight. I suspect that they were doing that because, against their will, they were much impressed by the arguments in Committee and on the Floor of the House on this issue. The hon. Member for Daventry differed from his hon. Friends in that he did not acknowledge that there had been a serious and thoughtful debate on this point. Instead, he made some silly and unjustified comments about the tone of the debate. He spoke about the other commitments which have been discussed. They were paltry and pathetic reasons for refusing to support a new clause that will extend the right to attendance allowance to children who now meet all qualifications for the award of that allowance other than the fact that they have not passed the age of two.

Comments were made from the Conservative about superficial remarks and about hon. M becoming too emotional about these matters. I know what we should get emotional about if it is sufferings and problems of children in those stances. It is outrageous for Conservative Mem suggest that, although of course they sympathise, o the tone of the debate they are unable to put that sy into action and vote in the Lobby in support of clause.

Mr. Nellist: I apologise to my hon. Friend the M for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) in case I p remarks that she is about to make. However, Chamber is fuller now I want to explain that n Friend is referring to complaints made by Tory M about the debate in Committee. Will she allo through her, to explain that we had more than 1 of debate in Committee and we have had more th hours of debate tonight on this matter? Tempers sides of the House have rightly, in my view, risen hi have heard from the Minister tonight that what argued about for nearly 13 hours concerns 3,000 c at a total allowance cost of £7 million. That is less per cent. of the cost of the crystal chandeliers an adornments in the new DHSS headquarters in Wh All that debate involved 3,000 children. That migh Tory Members' eyes and they might understand have been pushing the Minister. We cannot movement to help those 3,000 kids.

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend is right. I pay tri him, to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol (Ms. Primarolo) and to the hon. Member for Nu (Mr. Stevens) for the way in which they have brou issue to the attention of the House by raising const cases.

I want to consider the remarks made by th Member for Nuneaton. In a sense, he encapsula problem. He said that there is little doubt that in t that has been brought to his attention in his const the children satisfy every criteria for the aw attendance allowance except the fact that it cannot below the age of two. He spoke about the intentio new clause being correct and he hoped that the M would be able to give him some words of suppor the problems that prevented him from accepting t clause or giving effect to it in other ways.

In Committee we sought to give effect to the pr made by the hon. Member for Nuneaton. We as Minister to give the assurance that a review on thi would be undertaken and that, if our proposals w exactly the right way to proceed, whether he woul other proposals. All that he has told us is that we w to await the results of the review into the disabled may take several years.

The hon. Gentleman asked what reaso Government could give for not being able to agree least the principle of the new clause this evening. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that in Commit Minister said that it is somewhat difficult in some get the test exactly right and it "would create considerable difficulties for the atte allowance board."

I have considerable respect and sympathy f attendance allowance board, which has a difficult do, but my sympathy and respect for the board outweighed by my sympathy and respect for people such as the parents who are his constituents who are having to struggle to look after severely disabled children and who are being told that they cannot have the allowance because it might be difficult for the board.

My sympathy disappears when I look again at what the Minister said in Committee. He said:

"it is possible in some cases to identify the need for the allowance before age two . . . under the age of 18 months . . . I do not dispute the fact that some children can be identified and assessed . . . The allowance must be paid at a point when attendance needs can be clearly discerned to be in excess of those required by non-disabled children." — [Official Report, Standing Committee E, 17 November 1987; c. 64-5.]

But it is not so paid. It is not paid until the children reach the age of two, no matter how terrible their problems, no matter how great their difficulties and no matter how horrendous the struggles of their parents.

Some Conservative Members have spoken with amusement, sneering even, about the emotions that have been aroused on the Labour Benches by the issues raised by the new clause. I am proud of the fact that such emotions have been raised. It was unworthy of the Minister to suggest that the real anger and outrage expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) was hysterical.

It would be no wonder if someone was driven to hysteria watching the antics of some Conservative Members this evening. This is an issue of real seriousness and importance for the families involved. It is one on which the Minister has not, no matter how much he sought to convey his sympathy, been able to tell us that he will be able to move and the Opposition have no hesitation in seeking to divide the House.

New Clause 6

INCOME SUPPORT FOR YOUNG P

'At end of Section 21 (1) (b) of the Soc 1986 there shall be inserted the words "and the age of 18 and below pensionable age he a lower rate of benefit due to his age.".'.—/

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Fearn: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause deals with income support for young people. The intention is to remove the distinction between claimants for income support who are over and under the age of 25. From April 1988, single childless people between the ages of 18 and 24 who are entitled to claim for income support will receive £26·05, while those aged 25 and over will receive £6 more. We are completely opposed to this distinction, as it is completely arbitrary. Why, for example, should a person aged 24½ have fewer expenses and financial needs than someone six months older?

The Government perhaps believe that a person aged under rather than over 25 may be able to depend on parents. Forcing young people to depend on their parents is a recent trend in legislation and is a feature of clause 4 of the Social Security Bill. We should be encouraging young people to take full responsibility for their own lives.

The Liberal party is running an excellent campaign called "Youth Chance" which is designed to help young people take full advantage of their rights so that they can be more independent. In my constituency of Southport, young people certainly fight for their rights themselves, and I hope that they will continue to do so. The Government, by contrast, are helping to create an atmosphere of dependence around young people from which they will find it difficult to escape. That is totally against the Government's avowed aim to encourage independence among all people, and I am perplexed by this contradiction between the Government's aims and their actions.

The age limit of 25 used for income support is not a widely recognised age limit in the sense that 16, 18 and 21 years are commonly recognised ages that mark changes in a person's status. We now assume that once young people reach the age of 18 they are responsible adults and are expected to behave as such. This new age limit attacks that principle.

Similarly, the age limit of 25 years is not widely employed elsewhere in British legislation, so it is difficult to understand why it has been introduced for income support; unless, of course, it is merely a means by which the Government can save themselves a small amount of money. The amounts that will be saved are not great and the hardship and bitterness that this arbitrary age limit will cause cannot justify such a saving. I urge the Government to reflect on this very unfair distinction and to accept my amendment, which will prevent this injustice. I intend to take the matter to a Division.

Mr. Robin Cook: I remind the House that on many previous occasions the official Opposition have supported the principle advanced on this occasion by the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn). If he divides the House we shall be happy to divide with him. I do not think that at this late hour there is an argument of sufficient originality and novelty for the principle, which I could advance to the House, to change the minds of those who have already made up their minds. But I believe that the Government, in creating a quite new distinction between a full adult rate and a less than adult rate for those younger than 25, have introduced a new distinction into our social security system that is insupportable and cannot survive indefinitely.

10.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Michael Portillo): There are three things that we are not discussing tonight. One is the position of 16 and 17-year-olds. There has always been a lower rate of benefit for them under supplementary benefit, and the lower rate continues under income support. I do not think that is in dispute between us.

The second thing that we are not discussing is the position of couples because there will be no distinction in income support between what couples receive, whether above or below the age of 25. The third thing that we are not discussing is the position of parents because single parents will be paid the lone parent rate of income support, which is £33·40. On top of that they will receive the family premium, plus the single parent premium, plus the addition for the child.

The point that is at issue between us is the position of the single unemployed under the age of 25. Our movement away from the distinction of householder to a distinction on age grounds is dictated because we think this is a welcome simplification. All that is needed now to establish the entitlement of a claimant is one piece of information, the date of birth of the claimant. It avoids all the difficult points of definition that arise on householders and non-householders, let alone all the difficulties that arise if we try to divide benefits between people who are living together, sharing a house or a flat. As I have mentioned, there is a precedent for a division on age grounds in supplementary benefit, although I agree with the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) that that division was not at age 25. There may not be a precedent for that age, but I will tell him in a moment why we think 25 is the right age for the division.

Most young people expect to receive less when they are young than do others who are longer in the tooth, or than they themselves will receive later in life. That would be their general position if they were in work. I do not think it is such a far-reaching idea that people who are young should be expected to live off a lesser amount of money than people who are a little older. We have not taken that principle to its logical conclusion because we are protecting families of whatever age by treating couples, whether below or above the age of 18, equally by giving the special rate to single parents.

We chose the age of 25 because there is fairly good evidence for that being an important age in the life style of young people. In fact, 90 per cent. of claimants over the age of 25 are householders. On the other hand, only one in five single claimants under the age of 25 is a householder. As a result of the reforms, given those figures, of the 810,000 single claimants between the ages of 16 and 24, 450,000 will gain and 200,000 will experience no change.

Young single claimants will receive rates compensation of £1 in income support even though, as will be clear to the House, the majority of them will not be liable to pay rates. The amount that we will pay in income support of £26·05 compares with the non-householder rate of supplementary benefit of £24·35.

The most important extra cost that a person might face if he was a householder is the housing cost. That is met by a different benefit, housing benefit. Under the reformed system, the starting point for the payment of rent under the income support scheme is 100 per cent. of that rent payment. We believe strongly that housing benefit is the correct way to address the extra housing cost that a householder might have to face.

I think this is a welcome simplification. It represents a considerable improvement in the system. I believe, despite what the hon. Gentleman has said, that there is every logic to support the age of 25. I commend that approach to the House. I have to advise the House to reject the new clause.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:

Industrial Training

10.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Patrick Nicholls): I beg to move,

That the draft Industrial Training Levy (Construction Board) (No. 2) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 1st December, be approved.

The order requires parliamentary approval under the provisions of the Industrial Training Act 1982, because one part of it — that covering labour-only sub-contractors—involves a levy exceeding 1 per cent. of an employer's payroll. The levy proposals are in the same format as those approved by both Houses in January 1987, and show only one change from those arrangements. The board forecasts that the levy proposals will raise about £48 million.

The levy is made up of three parts. First, there will be an occupational levy on directly employed construction workers in the main industry. A set amount will be raised for each occupation, but that is subject to an overall limit of 1 per cent. of employers' wage bills. The rates vary according to the type of craftsman trained, and reflect the training costs of each craft. It is here that one change has been made from last year's levy proposals. The per capita levy rate for the principal building crafts has been reduced from £75 to £70. This has been made possible by a slightly lower than anticipated take-up of Construction Industry Training Board grants in that sector in the current year. Apart from that reduction, there are no changes in this year's levy proposals.

Secondly, the board proposes to retain the 2 per cent. levy on payments made by firms in the main industry for work done by labour-only sub-contractors. That rate has remained unchanged since 1981, and reflects the board's judgment that labour-only sub-contractors in general undertake too little training, relying instead on obtaining skilled manpower trained by other employers. For the main industry, covered by these two levy rates, companies with payrolls of £15,000 or less will not be required to pay levy. That will exclude from levy about 51 per cent. of all construction firms within the board's scope.

Thirdly, for the smaller brick manufacturing sector, the board proposes a rate of 0·05 per cent. of payroll. Employers with a wage bill of £100,000 a year or less will be excluded from the levy. That, too, is unchanged from last year.

The levy proposals have been approved by the board, and are strongly supported by the employers' organisations in the industry. In fact, as the proposals make no provision for exemption, and as some employers will be paying levy amounting to more than 0·2 per cent. of payroll, the board is required by the Industrial Training Act 1982 to demonstrate a double consensus of support for its proposals — first, among employer organisations representing all firms, large and small, which will pay the levy; and, second, among organisations representing firms that between them will pay more than 50 per cent. of the total levy. The fact that the board's proposals command that level of support, and have done so every year since the need for consensus was introduced in 1973, demonstrates the strong support in the industry for the board's work.

The levy proposals have been agreed by broad consensus among building employers, adopted by the board without opposition and approved by the Manpower Services Commission. They are necessary for the board to continue with its work of developing and improving training arrangements in the construction industry, and I therefore commend the order to the House.

10.50 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): While the Opposition support the order and congratulate the CITB on its work and the challenges that it has met over the past years, and, indeed, over the past year, and although the hour is late, I want to take the Minister to task briefly for not acknowledging tonight that there is a real crisis in the construction industry. There is a crisis in training for the construction industry as a whole. While the Minister is right to state that the Construction Industry Training Board conforms to a model that we would have liked to see in far broader terms for most of British industry, we still lament and regret the fact that the Government abolished all but six of the industrial training boards.

This evening I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Construction Industry Training Board is exactly the system that we admire: it is a statutory board, it has a levy and in many senses it is a very successful industrial training board. It is the model that we would like to see in the rest of British industry. While we admire the CITB and believe that much that it does is of great worth, there is something of a conundrum.

We warned the Government this time last year that there would be a crisis in training for the construction industry. Although there is an industrial training board and a consensus between employers and employees—and we cannot leave out the employees and the very positive approach that the Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians takes on all training matters—there is also tremendous evidence of skill shortages throughout the country, especially in the south-east, south-west and London. Those shortages of trained and skilled people in the construction industry have been caused by the reluctance to train over the past 10 years. While there is a levy and the industrial training board performs some of the job, there are other facets of Government policy that have undermined training in the construction industry, and it is important that I put them before the House briefly this evening.

The crisis facing the construction industry is very grave. It affects all the attempts to build major public and private projects and may endanger some of the projects that the Government hold dear and which they want to see reach fruition over the next two or three years during the Government's lifetime. However, the failure to train adequately in the construction industry will also frustrate any ambition to build publicly or privately provided homes for the homeless or to renovate and repair much of Britain's crumbling housing stock.

I hope that the House will indulge me when I ask, what are the reasons for the crisis and what can the CITB and the levy do about it? The present situation is largely of the Government's making. The crisis has been a long time coming. The Opposition warned the Government last year that there was a crisis and we warned them in the years before that. We told the Government that, if they did not take training seriously, particularly in crucial industries such as the construction industry which must lead in any economic regeneration, when any growth came it would be short indeed because it would run up against a shortage of skilled workers.

Half the problem is the construction industry's inability to reproduce the skills available to the industry. The CITB sometimes puts out figures that show a rough balance between the number of workers coming into the industry and the construction work going on, but if one looks beyond the statistics, one sees a disturbing picture. There are half the number of apprentices in training—half the number of skilled men and women coming into the industry—that there were 10 years ago.

There has been a dramatic decline in the industry's activity over that period, which coincides with the election of the Conservative Government in 1979. Now, the rate of building is back up to what it was in the mid and late 1970s, yet there is a great decrease in the amount of training. The reason for that is a serious question, which was partly answered in the Minister's brief introduction to the order this evening. It is due to the high level of exemption in the industry.

Let me give some evidence. An increasing portion of the industry is out of scope, due to the exemptions of small employers who make up an increasing share of the industry and due to the growth of labour-only sub-contractors being granted what are called 714 certificates. Despite the increasing activity of the CITB, that greater level of exemption means that less training is being done, even when the labour-only sector is levied at a rate of 2 per cent. That does not make up sufficiently for the failure of a large part of the industry to train.

Let me give some figures. The Minister will be aware that, in 1979, 30 per cent. of the construction industry was accounted for by one-person firms. Within six years, that shot up to 40 per cent. At the other end of the scale, in 1979, 20 per cent. of firms had between eight and 24 employees. In 1985, that had fallen to 10 per cent. of firms employing between eight and 24 employees. At the top level, in 1979, 6·7 per cent. of firms were the large companies that most people know, employing over 25 employees. By 1985 that had fallen to 4·5 per cent.

There has been a real change in the nature of the construction industry, to which the CITB has not been allowed to adapt. The Government have been completely unaware of the need to do something dramatic to change the nature of training in the industry. There has been a downward spiral of training due to the growth of small firms who are out of scope, and labour-only sub-contractors.

Another reason why the levy is not reaching the parts that it needs to reach is that the crisis in the construction industry has been aggravated by the Government's attitude towards local authorities and direct labour organisations. The Conservative party does not like local government or DLOs. But the DLOs do a wonderful job and they do a particularly good job in training.

Let me give one figure. In Greater London, the DLOs account for 14 per cent. of the construction work, but for 35 per cent. of training. The Government's persistent war on local authorities and direct labour organisations means that their ability to operate as such and their capacity to train have been severely affected. That is another reason for the training crisis in construction.

Moreover, the crisis that the construction industry fac because of the catastrophic shortage of skills will soon b accelerated. Just before Christmas, the Secretary of Sta announced yet another review of the skill centre networ which has been under attack from the Government for th past eight years. The Government have closed a third o the skill centres and have very little sympathy or patienc with what is left of the network. They refuse to understan that the skill centre network represents the majo opportunity for adult training in many of the tradition skills, as well as in the new technology skills.

Let us consider the impact of the skill centres on th levy and the inability of the levy to cope. The fact of th matter is that the skill centre network provides a larg percentage of the skilled workers entering the constructio industry. Only last year, the Under-Secretary' predecessor said at the Dispatch Box that a crisis packag of 4,000 new trainees must enter the construction industry He had had talks with the CITB. Of the 4,000, 2,000 wer to be provided by the CITB in new YTS places. That cam about, and more power to the CITB's elbow for deliverin those 2,000. One thousand were to come from othe providers—mainly private providers—of youth trainin in the construction industry.

It is interesting to note that only 250 of the promise 1,000 came on stream. The remaining 1,000 places, whic were to be financed partly by the levy, were to come fron the skill centres. The Minister will know that the skil centres delivered the extra places. In the financial yea 1986-87, skill centres trained 16,400 people in the essentia construction skills of bricklaying, carpentry and paintin and decorating — 7,400 unemployed people on MSC sponsored schemes and 9,000 adults already i employment. Such training and retraining are vital in a industry that is undergoing much change.

What can the CITB do, and how can the levy system be used, to meet the crisis that we are facing in the construction industry, which is as real as for any othe industry? It is scandalous in those sectors that no longe have statutory training bodies. The recent Anderson report, which the Minister should know well, points out that, whereas there is a handful of good non-statutory training bodies, most of them have been dismal failures. Large sections of British industry now fail to train to an adequate standard to keep us in competition with our French, German and other industrial competitors.

There is a collapse of training throughout British industry, and the construction industry is not immune to the problem. Skilled workers are not available now and soon with large schemes such as Canary wharf, the Channel tunnel, Sizewell B, the expansion of Stansted airport and the extension of the M25, the absence of the skilled people needed will be catastrophic. We are already feeling the absence of those skills, but they will be felt much more severely by this time next year.

A recent estimate shows that the Canary wharf scheme alone will require 15 per cent. of the manpower of our construction industry. The impact of that one scheme alone will be incredible. A recent survey of the Federation of Master Builders showed that 45 per cent. of its members were having difficulty finding qualified workers. Even with all the schemes that I have mentioned coming on stream, there is a crisis. Therefore, I am surprised that the Minister has been relatively complacent about what has been going on. The order comes through; he thinks that it is a good thing; he has laid on hands this evening, but he has not said one word about the crisis that we face.

In my final comments, I should like to suggest some answers to the crisis. What can the Government, the CITB and the levy system do to meet the situation? The Government's panic this time last year—they did panic—was too little, too late: 4,000 new trainees were not nearly enough even at that stage. Firm action on labour-only supply must be taken now; the legitimised lump, as it has become, will succeed in undermining the training system in the construction industry.

Although the answers are not simple, some action must be taken on one-person business exemptions and on the limit of £15,000 in turnover, because, as the Minister said, that is 51 per cent. of the industry. There must be a system whereby every employee in the construction industry is involved in training and comes within the purview of the industrial training board. The Government could tackle the way in which that is done. With the analysis and the new review of finance and training with which the Manpower Services Commission has just come forward, I believe that here is the opportunity to look again at strengthening the power of the CITB so that all employees in the construction industry will be covered.

Moreover, because of the picture that I have painted this evening, I believe that there is a need for a dramatic emergency programme to target particular regions and sectors to ensure that the shortages that I have described do not become a disaster for the great construction projects that are in hand. In docklands, for example, we must be able to find ways of training the people in Newham and Tower Hamlets, where there is 20 per cent. male unemployment. Those people must be trained to help in the task facing the construction industry. In our country, which still has dreadful levels of unemployment in its city centres—even in London—it must be possible to find a way of training those unemployed people to take part in such efforts.

In conclusion, I am afraid that the bullet that the Government are too ideologically blinkered to bite is that of contract compliance. If they really want to do something about the construction industry and training, they must say to a firm that wants to tender for work on large public or private contracts, "You will not get a contract unless you can show that you are training, and that every person on a site is eligible for training and has training and retraining as part of their individual contracts."

It is absurd that, when we still have massive unemployment, we have such dreadful skill shortages which will, as I have said, endanger the growth of our economy and the stimulation that many of those great projects offer. I do not want to discuss only Canary wharf, the Channel tunnel and the other great projects, but to return to the simple fact that many people in this country live in squalor—be it in public or private housing—largely due to the absence of skilled workers to renovate and refurbish their houses.

Of course we shall not oppose the motion tonight, but we believe that the Government must take in hand the crisis of training that lies beneath the issues that we have discussed.

Mr. Nicholls: In all fairness, I should reply briefly to the speech that the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) has just made. It is a great tribute to his eloquence that, in what might have been a narrow debate, he has been able to make a wide-ranging speech. I do not criticise him for that.

The hon. Gentleman admires the work done by the CITB, and I associate myself with his admiration. It will come as no news to the CITB that the hon. Gentleman feels as he does, but it will be pleased to hear him say so again. He said that there was a chronic skills shortage throughout the industry, and lays the responsibility for that at the Government's door. That cannot be right, because the main responsibility for training must lie in the hands of the employers. Going back to the 1970s, one can see that the economic state of the country was so parlous that it was not much good telling employers then that they should be thinking of the future and of investing in training. A great many of them, under the Governments of that time, were not so much investing in training as trying to keep their heads above water.

Mercifully, we now live in a different climate, but the damage done over the years cannot be repaired in a few moments. The skill shortages are more complicated than the hon. Gentleman would have us believe. It is inevitable that there will be skill shortages in parts of the country in an industry as diverse as the building industry. Having said that, however, there are grounds for optimism. A great deal of taxpayers' money is provided. Well over £1 billion is spent on YTS training, and well over £1·5 billion is spent on training in general. The CITB is responsible for the biggest YTS training agency. It has 22,000 trainees under training out of a total complement in the industry at large of about 62,000 trainees. That augurs well for the future.

The hon. Gentleman complained about the decline of traditional apprenticeships. I understand his point, but times move on. There are ways into the building industry now other than through the traditional craft apprenticeships. The hon. Gentleman would acknowledge that, too. One can, for instance, discuss the role increasingly played by those who enter the industry as site surveyors, planners, buyers, estimators, site engineers, civil engineers, production managers, quantity surveyors, structural engineers, and so on. All those people play an increasing part in a changing building and construction industry, but do not enter it via traditional apprenticeships. Even a substantial number of those now in YTS training use that training as a foundation course before going on to an apprenticeship.

The Government are putting a vast amount of taxpayers' money into providing the infrastructure necessary for training, and are doing the initial pump priming in YTS and other schemes. However, in the end training is a matter for the employers.

Not for the first or the last time, the hon. Gentleman and I differ over the future of the boards. Honest men will sometimes honestly differ. Speaking rhetorically, so that I do not provoke him, perhaps I can say that if his attitude to the creation or existence of the CITB were right, he would have to say that all the 16 boards that were quietly laid to rest by the Government and replaced by non-statutory training organisations had been doing a super job—but they clearly had not. At the time, the industry accepted that the CITB was doing a decent job, and the hon. Gentleman has already paid tribute to that. The CITB was perceived to be doing a good job, which is why it survived. The hon. Gentleman is perhaps stretching the imagination and the facts a little too extremely if he believes that in the good old days of the many training boards training was at a higher level. It would be nice if that were the truth; in fact, it is not.

I hope that the hon. Member for Huddersfield will not take it amiss if I take him up on a point of detail regarding his remedy for bringing more people into scope. I can understand him saying that, because the exemption level is at £15,000 and has been so since 1975, there must be fewer and fewer people within scope. However, because there has been a general increase in the economy, with small businesses coming into operation, it is perhaps surprising — certainly it is true — that more and more people have come into scope even though the £15,000 exemption has not been raised since 1975.

The hon. Gentleman is of the opinion that the Government do not like the skill centres and have it in for them. I believe that I can set the hon. Gentleman's mind at rest regarding our motives. Two reports have cast considerable doubt on whether the skill centres are providing the right sort of training at the right sort of price.

The National Audit Office report said that it considered that the MSC's agreement to purchase fixed amounts of training from the Skills Training Agency had resulted in the MSC incurring "considerably higher total costs for providing training courses".

The Public Accounts Committee noted the action that the MSC was taking to improve value for money in the operation of schemes, but expected it to "continue its efforts to minimise the diseconomy arising from its agreement with the Skills Training Agency to purchase a fixed amount of training at Skillcentres".

Faced with such evidence, it would have been the height of folly for the Government not to respond.

Without in any sense trying to prejudge the eventual outcome, it was clearly right for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment to ensure that outside consultants would consider the matter and decide whether the STA is doing the job that the hon. Gentleman and I would want it to do.

Mr. Sheerman: As a former member of the PAC, I can understand what was said by the Committee and the National Audit Office. However, I do not believe that those quotes should be taken out of context. The skill training network has changed a great deal, but the PAC did not look at the broader fact that the skill centres represent the one agency in the country with proven success in imparting skills to adults. No other organisation or institution has been as successful as those centres.

Mr. Nicholls: If I were to concede those remarks in their entirety, I would be pre-empting the result of the inquiry that we have instituted. I believe that the hon. Gentleman and I would be at one in wanting to see the right type of training delivered to those in need of it at the right price. If there is prima facie evidence to suggest that the MSC is paying too much taxpayers' money — our money and that of our constituents — to the STA, that evidence should be studied. That is as far as it goes. The being considered and I would not like to m judgments at this stage.

The hon. Gentleman has his doubts about wh levy goes wide enough. The two main limbs of cover firms with a payroll of £15,000, which rep person and a half. I had better not say a man an as I might be leapt at from other areas of the [Interruption.] I understand that the hon. question is not here.

The levy of £15,000 covers a small number of e and although it may, on the basis of the hon. Gen calculation, exclude 51 per cent. of those wh otherwise be in scope, it affects only 2 per cent. of force. On the basis that the devil can quote figur own purposes, I can find such a figure.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman did not i identify labour-only sub-contracting automatic the black economy. Although he came up with a of alliteration, "the legitimised lump", I did not personally, as I assumed that he was referrin operation of labour-only sub-contractors.

It is entirely true that, in the very nature o labour-only sub-contractors do not usually play and large a part in training as they otherwise mig is inevitable from the very nature of them. Hav that they are the legitimate part of the industry, not the illegitimate part. A swingeing levy is imp them. The board has instituted one scheme, the le system, to operate for training those who will be only sub-contractors, and another pilot sc operating to that effect.

The hon. Gentleman is right to say that this particular problem, but it is the legitimate en problem. The CITB feels that the labour-o contractors play their part, through the pilot proj are operating and the levy imposed.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Does the Minis that one of the problems that dogs the cons industry is that the differential in wages between th skilled and semi-skilled or unskilled is too low to a the kind of——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): O had better stick to the levy rather than discuss structure in the industry.

Mr. Nicholls: I am tempted to respond to m Friend, but I know from experience that I would n to get away with it. I ask my hon. Friend to come me later.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield finished w started, by talking about the necessity to train. Th be entirely right. Billions of pounds of taxpayers' are being devoted to that end. Training construction industry is not a straightforward or matter. It is a peripatetic industry, which brings pa problems in its wake. Training must be the respo of the employers, and there is increasing evidence that employers are matching that responsibili Government have a role to play in ensuring t billions of pounds are spent properly, and ther doubt that they are fulfilling that role to the full.

Cerebral Palsy

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this Hou do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

11.22 pm

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): I am sure that whenev a child is born a parent's deepest wish is, "Pray God th be healthy." Alas, through no one's fault, some childr do not enjoy full health, and some suffer from cerebr palsy. At present, hundreds of children with gra impairment of their motor co-ordination are destined remain bedridden or in wheelchairs, unable to sit, stan walk or achieve even a modest measure of independenc

I started to learn about cerebral palsy only by parer coming to see me to tell me about their hopes for the children's future. Several families in my constituency ha children afflicted with cerebral palsy. One extreme courageous mother has three children who are so afflicte

They came to see me not to whinge but with a messa of hope that their children could one day walk and li more independent lives because they had either been to were going to the Peto Institute in Budapest. Some fi families from north Oxfordshire have been to Budapes They wanted to make sure that I understood the potenti of conductive education and the outstanding achievemen that are being made at the Peto Institute.

Many hon. Members have had a far closer involveme than I in trying to ensure the maximum opportunities f children suffering from cerebral palsy. The right ho Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) h always been tireless in his efforts on behalf of the disabl and has led an all-party parliamentary campaign promote conductive education.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (M Coombs), before entering the House, was a Birmingha city councillor and was largely responsible for helping set up the Foundation for Conductive Education Birmingham. My right hon. and learned Friend t Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister Trade and Industry visited the Peto Institute when he w Minister for Health. The Institute was similarly visited b my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreig and Commonwealth Office on behalf of the Foreig Office, and in a personal capacity by Lady Howe, the wi of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of Sta for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Many hon. Members have first-hand experience helping to raise money for the Foundation for Conductiv Education in Birmingham. They include the ho Members for Walsall, South (Mr. George) and f Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) and the Parliamenta Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my ho Friend the Member for Coventry, South-West (M Butcher). I simply seek to add my voice because I hav been so greatly impressed by the courage of tho constituents of mine who have children afflicted wit cerebral palsy, and impressed by the evidence of my ow eyes of what has clearly been achieved in Budapest.

When, for example, little Richard Shakespeare was fir brought to see me by his parents, I never in my wilde dreams believed that this little boy, who could barely rai his own head unaided, could within a matter of month stand on his own two feet. But the truth is that Richar Shakespeare can now stand on his own two feet wit confidence and move his arms naturally, thanks to th training that he has received at the Peto Institute. I know that there are many children like Richard who have improved beyond their parents' greatest hopes. Credit, in Richard's case, must go to Oxfordshire county council for being prepared to pay Richard's fees in Budapest and for helping with some of the travel costs.

As the House will know, conductive education has been developed in Hungary and is used there as the main basis for the early education of physically handicapped children. The emphasis of the movement is on establishing sufficient control for the individual child to take part in everyday life without the use of artificial aids. Children are allocated to one particular teacher known as the conductor, who takes them through the whole process of education as they grow older.

Conductive education is hard work; it is intensive, with children being taught from the time they wake up in the morning until they go to bed at night. This approach clearly has great success. I understand that the Hungarians estimate that it could help 70 per cent. of all children afflicted with cerebral palsy, across the whole spectrum of the disability range, to achieve self auto-function; in other words, to reach a position where they can live as independently as children of a similar age and can walk with confidence and be able to go to school.

This is a fantastic achievement. There is, of course, the evidence of the experience of those who have been to Budapest and the evidence of our own eyes as to what has been achieved out there. It is clearly good news that the Peto Institute is collaborating with the Foundation for Conductive Education which, as the House knows, is a national charity formed to establish the Hungarian system of conductive education in Britain and collaborating to set up an integrated programme to train conductors and to establish working conductive groups of children. The Peto Institute has undertaken to train British conductors to the same high standard as its own and will co-operate to ensure that conductive education is established and working properly here in Britain. We all have good cause to be grateful to the Peto Institute.

I also have little doubt that what has been achieved by mutual understanding has come about in large part because of the efforts and energy of the staff of the British embassy in Budapest and the Hungarian embassy in London. I understand that a British-Hungarian cultural exchange agreement is to be negotiated in the next few months. It is hoped that it will include a provision that will enable this invaluable co-operation to continue and to expand.

It is also extremely encouraging that the Government have provided a grant of £326,000 to enable Birmingham university to carry out a research evaluation of the Foundation for Conductive Education project over a five-year period. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security and her colleagues in the Department of Health and Social Security and the Department of Education and Science, with the help that they have received from Ministers within the Foreign Office, are to be congratulated on the initiatives that they have taken so far. Clearly it is right and proper to ensure that conductive education is evaluated in this country before being more widely available. However, as yet there is no conductive education in this country to evaluate.

This project should not be a matter of fiv research, with us then standing back and seein been learned and deciding what to do next approach could result in the loss of valuable momentum and, most important, could affec relationship with the Peto Institute, and I beli the only country with such a close involvemen

The international pressures on the Peto In such that, if we are to maintain the closen involvement, we must have clear commitment strong reason appears to question the v conductive education, there should be a clear co on the part of the Government, in co-oper others—individuals, charities and local autho secure the future of the Birmingham centre with five years and to expand conductive education t Britain. That can be done by people from th being trained in Budapest and, in turn, returni to the same high standard further conductors h by that cascade effect, conductive education available throughout the country.

Britain is at present the only country that i so closely with the Peto Institute. We thu wonderful opportunity to ensure that good c education may become established here. It w tragedy if we lost that opportunity and the n that has been established with the Peto Institut

It is difficult for a fit person to imagine how it must be for a child to be confined to a whee to have difficulty moving about. While c education cannot help all children afflicted b palsy, it is clear that it can help many. It is c calculate the costs of the special educational req of children who are confined to wheelchairs or severe difficulty in moving about. Those co however, be far greater in the long term than term costs involved in those children being benefit of conductive education here in Britain

The Government have demonstrated their v to support conductive education. Let us make determination to make conductive education throughout Britain as soon as possible so that ch Richard Shakespeare may also get up and stand on their own two feet. I ask for nothing more an less than a commitment to make the introducti conductive education a firm policy objective.

11.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I co my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. his success in the ballot and on raising the quest valuable treatment known as conductive educat is being undertaken at the Peto Institute in Bud

As my hon. Friend pointed out, we have number of favourable reports about the Peto from Members in all parts of the House. He refe visit made to the institute by the Chancellor of t of Lancaster in November 1984 when he was M Health. I am also aware of the favourable comm by the Minister of State, Foreign and Comm Office, my hon. and learned Friend the Me Putney (Mr. Mellor), when he visited the instit autumn of last year with Lady Howe, the w Foreign Secretary. Other Members have also v Peto Institute or taken an interest in the develo conductive education in this country, and my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury referred in his speech to several of them.

We are aware that about 70 families with children now attend the Peto Institute and are currently living in Budapest. Of those, we think that about 40 are British, the rest coming from other countries. The total school roll is about 750 children and 250 adults. It is sometimes forgotten that much of the work of the institute is with adults who have motor impairment, perhaps as the result of an accident, and I am also interested in aspects of that work.

I am sure that my hon. Friend will join me in paying tribute to the tremendous efforts of Her Majesty's ambassador in Budapest, and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Appleyard, in providing help and comfort to the United Kingdom families there. I understand in particular that Mrs. Appleyard has regular weekly lunches to enable the families to meet together, and I wish to put on record our appreciation to her for her efforts.

It has to be recognised that the extent to which it is possible to help United Kingdom nationals who voluntarily leave this country to seek treatment abroad is constrained by the statutes laid down by this House. Perhaps it will do no harm, and some good, if I remind families that, except in the most restricted and extreme circumstances, Ministers in this Department have no power to pay for treatment of this kind in most other countries. My colleagues in the Department of the Environment have no powers to pay for accommodation, nor do their own local authorities. My colleagues in the Department of Education and Science are similarly constrained.

According to a letter that was sent recently to the Oxfordshire local education authority by Mr. Sawtell from the Department of Education and Science, there may even be some difficulty if the local education authorities pay, since the definition of "school" under the current legislation seems to apply only to schools in this country. However, some local education authorities make such payments. I recognise that the local education authorities take their own legal advice and that some, such as Oxfordshire, have decided to proceed.

We are therefore doing a kindness by warning families that, if they choose to go to Hungary or, indeed, anywhere else, we have no power to assist them; nor do the Hungarian authorities have any obligation to remit fees, to find or pay for accommodation or transport, or anything else. Before families commit themselves to spending a year or more in another country with a very different culture and language, however kind people are to them while they are there, we hope that they will give careful thought to these points.

Some United Kingdom social security benefits may continue, if the beneficiary goes abroad specifically for medical treatment—for example, attendance allowance, mobility allowance and invalidity benefit. There should be no problem concerning child benefit in respect of any child attending the institute, provided that there is a responsible adult in the United Kingdom to whom the benefit can be paid. However, child benefit in respect of other children accompanying a disabled child to Budapest can only be paid for up to eight weeks.

Some parents have reported difficulty over renewing benefits while abroad, since more than one office must be contacted. To help to simplify matters, we have introduced some common rules and we shall do what we can them, but again we are somewhat constrained different statutes that cover the various concerned.

I am very concerned about the appalling pres families in these circumstances and on the family m including children, who have to stay behind. The been divorces. The price that some people have to been very high indeed. Nevertheless, I should like on record our thanks to the Peto Institute for the k that it has shown to the families and children con and also our appreciation to the Hungarian auth We shall bear my hon. Friend's remarks in mind renegotiate regularly the various agreements that with the authorities in Hungary.

The technique of conductive education as prac the Peto Institute is the main system of early educa physically handicapped children in Hungary, whe regarded as a necessity that a child should be able to school if he or she wishes to receive normal ed with able-bodied children. No such rule exists he disabled children are readily integrated into schools, following the Warnock reforms earlier 1980s. The technique is quite intensive and can re child to be resident in the institute.

The work goes on throughout working hours, hardly surprising if some children show consi improvement. The institute can be highly selective, is probably right that it should be selective. We expect any one technique to be universally success all conditions. We have no reason to doubt its succe as claimed, of about 70 per cent. of children being attend normal schools after treatment, but there ar a number of questions that we should wish t answered relating to the techniques that are used Peto Institute.

For example, to what extent does the tec concentrate on certain aspects of disability example, motor development, or incontinence— expense of something that we would regard as imp which is all-round social development? What do institute do about the more severely or m handicapped children? If there is no chance of a chi walking again, or if the treatment fails, are childre regarded as ineducable — as, for example, D syndrome children were regarded in this country quite recently?

What is the procedure? Is there an alter procedure if the child has difficulty in communicat understanding the commands of the conductor? long-term follow-up arrangements are provided community? What happens if a child, for example, condition that is subject to a relapse, or if he degenerative problem? In other words, we need to whether the effect is lasting.

We also need to know why the institute ex epileptics. We need to know to what extent the high of concentrated service input at the institute contribu the success of the type of education that is provide need to know what is the role of the parents. schemes—for example, the Philadelphia system very heavily on parents and helpers. It may be th should need to take on board messages and lessons more than one scheme.

Given those two main concerns, there are unanswered questions. We are concerned about fa who feel obliged to go abroad. I feel very sympathetic to what my hon. Friend has said about doing the work here. Recently, with my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs), a junior Minister at the Department of Education and Science, I met some of the families concerned in the campaign to bring conductive education to this country. On behalf of both Departments I say that we do not wish to stand in the way of any techniques that would assist disabled people, including children with cerebral palsy, spina bifida or any condition that would benefit from improved techniques.

When the BBC television programmes were broadcast, therapists in this country, for example, in Preston, protested that the techniques were available here and were being used to benefit people. In that respect, therefore, it seemed wise to take the following approach. The Government have involved themselves in two studies. My hon. Friend has already referred to the Birmingham project. He is probably aware that I am acquainted with a large number of the people who are interested in that project. I am delighted to join him in the tribute he paid to my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs), who was my fellow councillor in Birmingham for a number of years, for his efforts to get something set up.

The research project arose out of the Anglo-Hungarian cultural agreement, which was signed in Budapest on 21 March 1986 under the auspices of the British Council, involving Birmingham university and the Teachers' Training and Education Institute for the Motor Disabled in Hungary. Because of the need to approach the development of conductive education in a systematic way, it was decided that the Government could four-year research project being un Birmingham university to train conductor method of conductive education by funding of the project.

As my hon. Friend has said, the Governm provided some £326,000 over five years for t I understand that the first batch of 10 teache the research project either have gone or w going to Budapest for part of their training. some valuable information comes out of the my hon. Friend's view that if we get goo quickly than five years, we should be able t

Apart from this, the DHSS and the DE funded a survey by the Spastics Society into which aspects of conductive education are b in the United Kingdom. Findings are ex available later this year.

I hope that the approach I have outlined progress has been made in the past 12 montl United Kingdom. We look forward w enthusiasm and great sympathy to the results and to hearing more from families who h from the work at Peto and perhaps from th not had the opportunity to benefit, despit their children assessed there. It is also hel about the failures because that helps understand the successes.

I am most grateful to my hon. Friend fo important issue and giving us a chance to p our policy as it stands at the moment.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Home Accidents

2. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what his Department is doing to reduce the number of accidents in the home.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Francis Maude): We are doing a great deal to reduce the number and severity of home accidents. The new Consumer Protection Act 1987, and in particular the general safety requirement, greatly improves the protection provided for consumers by introducing tougher but more flexible consumer safety laws. We are now doing more than ever before to educate consumers about potential hazards. In November I announced a series of home safety awareness campaigns designed to make people more aware of the dangers in and around the home. I expect those and other initiatives to reduce home accidents.

Mr. Boswell: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply and for the action that was taken on foam-filled furniture earlier in the week. Does he agree that more than 5,000 fatalities a year in the home are still far too many? Because such fatalities occur in different places, often on private property and behind closed doors, they represent the Cinderella of the public protection industry. Will my hon. Friend re-emphasise the importance of starting safety education at school and, at adult level, reminding people of the availability of cheap, effective devices, such as stair guards and smoke detectors, which are now readily available and realistically priced?

Mr. Maude: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Of course, there is a role for regulation, as we showed earlier in the week in respect of foam-filled furniture. However, most accidents in the home occur as a result of people's behaviour rather than because of design faults in products. Most accidents in the home are as a result of falls. The home safety awareness campaign is a series that we are running for three years, and its purpose is to try to influence the way in which people behave.

Mr. Ashton: After the most humiliating climb-down of any Minister in 20 years regarding foam-filled furniture, is it not a fact that there is a major loophole in that legislation because it does not apply to beds? Is the Minister aware that in bed-and-breakfast accommodation and many other places of overcrowding, chil have to sleep in the same room in which the often next to an electric fire? Mr. Maude: I do not want to reduce this debu political wrangling, because it would not be a but I must remind the hon. Gentleman that we Government who have done anything about furniture. That danger has been apparent for if not 20, years, but the Labour Government th Gentleman supported in the late 1970s did nothing about it. We accept that there may be with beds. Mr. Maude: There are already regulatio toughest in the world — in respect of u furniture, and those will remain in force. We are in the process of standards for items such as mattresses, which w benchmark for safety in that area. Howeve looking urgently to see whether we can take furt

Mr. Maude: There is a serious danger that th all this regulation may be to induce in people a f of security, because there is no way in which we c complete safety in the home by regulation and le I reiterate that safety in the home depends, continue to depend to a large extent, on the wa behave. Mr. Beggs: I welcome the action that is propo at this late stage, and share the Government's an steps should be taken to improve safety in the h respect to foam-filled furniture. Will the Ministe the House whether he has yet consulted the Ireland Office or the Secretary of State for Ireland to ensure that Northern Ireland hou receive similar protection in future?

Mr. Maude: We shall certainly talk to the Northern Ireland Office about the impact of any regulations on Northern Ireland. The hon. Gentleman talked about action being taken at a late stage, but I must tell the House again that we already have in force the toughest regulations anywhere in the world in respect of foam-filled furniture.

COCOM

3. Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he last met his COCOM colleagues; and what matters were discussed.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Alan Clark): I have not met my COCOM colleagues recently, but the Department's officials participate regularly in COCOM meetings. Matters discussed recently have included the review of the control lists and efforts to improve the operation of COCOM.

Mr. Atkinson: Is my hon. Friend aware of the growing number of cases of British exporters of high technology being set up by the CIA under the guise of the COCOM rules? Is he further aware of the high volume of American technology illegally sold to the Soviet bloc, most notably through Norway? Does that not suggest that we should have an urgent fundamental review of the working and enforcement of the COCOM rules?

Mr. Clark: Yes, there is something in what my hon. Friend says. The COCOM list is composed of three categories — the munitions list, the atomic energy list, and the industrial list, which is the longest. I feel sure that the House would not wish to see anything done that would prejudice the strategic controls on the munitions and atomic energy lists, but my hon. Friend is right in saying that the industrial list could be overhauled much more often than it is. We have had a rolling review since 1984, which considers a quarter of the list every six months, but my feeling is that a great deal of material that is obsolete and does not deserve to be included remains on the list. Unfortunately, COCOM must have unanimity before an item can be removed from the list, and it entails an arduous negotiating process to achieve that.

On the question of breaches of COCOM, it is particularly regrettable that other countries, particularly Norway and Japan, have broken the COCOM agreement and sold sensitive industrial material to the Soviet Union. I do not know of any instance in which the United States has done that, but it is true that there are rumours — and I should be glad to have the facts from my hon. Friend if he can provide them — that from time to time the United States precludes competitive items from being sold and may then find other ways to fill the gap itself.

Mr. Skinner: Why does the Minister not turn round to his hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) and tell him that there is now a different ball game between the Prime Minister and Gorbachev? He is the bloke with whom she says she can do business. She gallivants down the streets of Moscow with him and meets him on the tarmac at Brize Norton. The world has changed in the past few months, and the Minister should tell his hon. Friend that.

Mr. Clark: I am glad to have the hon. Gentleman's support and endorsement. He will be glad to hear—the reasons that he cited may have somethir —that the United Kingdom takes the have the COCOM list simplified and re

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman ma point, and I agree with him.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I welcome any improvement for Austin—and even for Rover—but can the Minister tell us why, in his opinion, the production of cars of 2·8 litres and more, which constitute the major part of exports to Japan, is only three quarters of what it was in the early 1970s? Why are our exports of cars only half what they were in the early 1970s, and why has the import penetration of cars into our market risen from less than 40 per cent. in 1979 to more than 50 per cent. today?

Mr. Atkins: I think that the hon. Gentleman and the House are aware that in past years there were question marks over some British manufacturers and the cars that they produced. Since then things have improved beyond all peradventure, and increasing numbers of cars made in this country are being purchased. None the less, my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, who is in Japan at the moment, and everyone else will continue to push the case for an increasing share of the Japanese market.

Export Promotion

5. Mr. Amess: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many people in his Department are engaged in export promotion work.

Mr. Alan Clark: Approximately 730.

Mr. Amess: Is my hon. Friend aware that many companies in Basildon have achieved excellent export results over the last year and that they have certainly been helped in their endeavours by his officials? Will he join me in congratulating two companies in particular, Fisherman's Friend, which now exports to 37 countries and has recently won a West German order for £1 million, and a much smaller firm, Uniscan, which, after inventing a walking frame for the disabled, now exports to six countries?

Mr. Clark: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks about the officials in my Department. I am glad to extend congratulations to the companies that he mentioned. Of course, my Department will always do its best and, under the enterprise initiative announced yesterday my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, we shall be able to do more, especially for small businesses. In the end, success is due to the efforts and the commitment of the private sector itself.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does the Minister recall that memorable day last year when we had all his huffing and puffing at the Dispatch Box about exports to Japan? Is he satisfied that since then there has been movement on this matter and, if so, could he tell us what movement there has been?

Mr. Clark: The puffing, which was not only from the Government side, related to exports from, not to, Japan. Alas, they are not in balance. However, exports to Japan have increased by 30 per cent. over the past year.

Mr. Wells: What evidence does my hon. Friend have that the export promotional activity of his Department is being hindered by the rise in the value of the pound?

Mr. Clark: None.

Mr. Cryer: Are the 730 people who are assisting in export promotion making any dent in our massive balance of trade deficit in manufactured goods? W British Leyland, for example, to reco proportion of exports to Japan, do they British manufacturing industry, or to fat Leyland simply so that it can be sol contributors of funds to the Tory party? If B is ever sold off it will be an outrage becau quantities of taxpayers' money that have company. The citizens of Britain expect th to play its part in making sure that Briti successful.

Mr. Clark: I always enjoy the hon. questions. He rather lost his way, I suspect that question, but I shall answer the first p

Mr. Conway: Will my hon. Friend and so of 730 look at the help, advice and encour to firms that are not in big city areas, wh covered by chambers of commerce and trad but are perhaps in small rural areas, and e take part in international trade fairs?

Mr. Clark: That is very important and it why, under the new arrangements, a furthe of staff of the Department are going into th British Overseas Trade Board has an active role to play in assisting small companies to fairs and exhibitions abroad. Chemicals

6. Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Chan Duchy of Lancaster by how much the trad chemicals changed between the second quarte the second quarter of 1987; and what are th figures for the average, best and worst Organisation for Economic Co-ope Development country.

8. Mr. Rogers: To ask the Chancellor of Lancaster by how much Britain's share of w chemicals changed between 1979 and 1986; a the comparable figure in the best, averag performing Organisation for Economic Co-o Development country.

Mr. Atkins: Britain's trade balance in c measured by the ratio of our exports to our by 9 per cent. between 1979 and 1986. This w same as the OECD average. Among the to exporters of chemicals, France saw a 4 per c in her export-import ratio and the United Sta of 39 per cent. Throughout this period Kingdom has had a substantial surplus on chemicals.

Between 1979 and 1986 Britain's share of OECD exports of chemicals was unchanged at 9·5 per cent. Among the OECD's major exporters of chemicals, the changes ranged from an increase of 13 per cent. in Japan's share to a decrease of 13 per cent. in the share held by the United States.

Mr. Grant: Is not the true situation that over the period imports have risen twice as fast as exports? Is this not yet another example of Government neglect of a wealth-producing manufacturing industry?

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong. This is a success story, again. There are many success stories that we do not hear about. The United Kingdom has a substantial surplus on her trade in chemicals. It is the number one export industry in the manufacturing sector. We ought to tell the world, as I am doing and as the Opposition ought to be doing, that we are doing well.

Mr. Ashton: What about No. 7?

Mr. Speaker: Order. No. 6 comes before No. 7.

Mr. Rogers: Is the Minister not misleading the House by simply saying that we have a surplus in chemical exports as opposed to imports, when that surplus is rapidly diminishing? Since 1979 imports have increased by over 50 per cent. The Minister should give both sides of the story. He should point out to the House that the chemical industry's share of the British market is steadily declining and that, because of very low investment in chemicals, we are gradually falling behind the rest of the world.

Mr. Atkins: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's interest in chemical matters, but in this instance he is wrong. In proportionate terms, as I said in the previous answer, we are comparable to many other OECD countries. This is an important industry, and it is doing well. It is achieving great success at home and abroad, and we ought to congratulate it on its success rather than whinge about it.

Mr. Stern: Does my hon. Friend agree that, despite attempts by Opposition Members to poor-mouth the chemical industry, it is showing consistent success? If they are worried about lack of investment in the industry, will he draw to their attention the investment of well over £100 million by ICI, on the border of my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Cope)?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend is quite right. ICI has achieved a great deal of success. I opened a plant in Fleetwood not so long ago, which again indicates a very great success. I repeat that this success story ought to be told to all who can hear.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Charles Kennedy.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. No points of order at Question Time.

Mr. Heffer: On a point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. No points of order at Question Time.

Mr. Heffer: The Liberal Benches are empty.

Mr. Speaker: I know. I cannot help it.

British Steel

10. Mr. Butler: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he last met the chairman of British Steel; and what matters were discussed.

16. Mr. Morley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he next intends to meet the chairman of British Steel to discuss the state of the industry.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I last met the chairman on 16 December. No date has yet been fixed for our next meeting. When we meet we discuss a wide range of issues relating to BSC and its prospects.

Mr. Butler: Did my right hon. and learned Friend discuss the £190 million half-year profit that BSC has made? Is that not a wonderful tribute to the management and men, who have shown great sense in not standing in the way of privatisation of the steel industry?

Mr. Clarke: I congratulated Sir Robert Scholey and all his colleagues on their excellent half-yearly results. We are looking forward optimistically to the full-year results that will be announced in due course. I agree with my hon. Friend that the results are a tribute to everyone working in the corporation, including the work force, who have achieved remarkable changes in the competitive position of the industry over the past few years.

Mr. Leigh: When my right hon. and learned Friend met the chairman of British Steel, did he discuss regional development grants? Did the chairman inform him that British Steel has often used regional development grants to rationalise and shed labour? Is it not a fact that regional development grants have often resulted in growing distortions in the economy and that the puny have been victimised to pay for the mighty? Is it not a disgrace that hon. Members cannot ask questions about the regional development grants because the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) was not present in the Chamber as the white smoke has not yet come out of Cowley street?

Mr. Clarke: Regional development grant was very useful in its time and no doubt British Steel made use of it. As I explained yesterday, the time has come to make better use of our money. I agree with my hon. Friend that it is a pity that I could not answer earlier questions tabled on the regional development grant. However, I understand that the Liberals and Social Democrats have taken an interest in policy. That is quite a novelty for them and they have not yet brought the results to the Floor of the House.

Dr. Reid: Is the Minister aware that, like the Liberals and Social Democrats, we in Lanarkshire have a major steel problem—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Dr. Reid: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I will temper my remarks.

Is the Minister aware that the optimistic bleatings that have come forth about the British Steel Corporation are regarded with wide scepticism among many people in Lanarkshire?—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] I will explain why. In particular, does the Minister realise that his supposed seven-year guarantee for Ravenscraig is seen by many as a timetable for execution over a seven-year period? In addition, why was there no mention in the Minister's statement or in other statements of the tubes division of the British Steel Corporation. There are threats and ambiguities over that division? Will he take the opportunity today to assure us that there is a strategic future for the tubes division and that any necessary investment to ensure that future at the Clydesdale plant at Bellshill will be provided?

Mr. Clarke: In response to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I am responsible only for privatising the steel industry. I suspect that the other Steel is about to be privatised by his colleagues, but that is not a matter for me. With regard to the serious question about Lanarkshire, in my statement on the preparations for privatisation I was able to announce that the corporation in its commercial judgment had said that, subject to market conditions, there was a future for steelmaking on the Ravenscraig site for at least seven years. That should give considerable comfort to those in Lanarkshire. That is a tribute to the success that they have helped to achieve. The future of that plant will inevitably depend on those commercial judgments and the ability to compete in the market, regardless of who owns the industry.

There have been problems on Clydesdale with seamless tubes and there have been losses in that division of British Steel. However, I understand from my discussions with Sir Robert that the losses have now been reduced and there is no particular problem facing the future of Clydesdale at the moment.

Mr. Devlin: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that among the many letters that I have received from my constituents involved in the steel industry on Teesside there have been a number of messages of support for the Government's privatisation line and a widespread wish by the work force to be involved in the share issue and to take full advantage of an industry in which they believe and to which they are fully committed for the future?

Mr. Clarke: I am not surprised that my hon. Friend receives that reaction in his constituency, because the Redcar works are very successful and profitable. The workers can see the benefits of the greater commercial freedom that the Government have already given to the management in recent years. Therefore, they have no fears about a privatised company free of Government controls. At the moment we are preparing for privatisation, but the Government are committed to the policy of giving shareholding opportunities to workers in their own industry wherever that is remotely possible.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: As the Minister has now made it clear that he accepts responsibility for the privatisation of British Steel, will he ensure that all reports from his discussions with British Steel are brought back to the House for debate by hon. Members? Will he ensure at his next meeting with British Steel that he asks whether it has a strategy involving a move to a one-plate mill concept within the United Kingdom, which is of particular interest to the workers at Dalzell? Finally, will he ensure that the exact problems of Scotland are taken into consideration in any privatisation moves in order to ensure that Scotland does not continue to be seen as being on the periphery, as we need to have a Scottish steel headquarters to guarantee our jobs and futures because steel is so vital to our manufacturing base?

Mr. Clarke: The statement that I made before Christmas was a serious and considered report to the House of the Government's proposals and of the corporation's commercial judgment of where the business stood. I shall ensure that the House is kept up to date and informed.

Some serious investment decisions regarding the plate mills will be required in the next few years, but, again, British Steel's position is that no investment decisions are needed now, and it will be a matter for it to decide in due course, probably after it becomes a private company. The Scots should not continue to regard themselves as necessarily peripheral to all these matters. Quite the reverse is true in view of the statements that the corporation was able to make in its commercial judgment about the future of steel making in Ravenscraig for at least seven years.

Mr. Grylls: In view of the real advantages, not least to the people who work in British Steel, of bringing forward privatisation, when will my right hon. and learned Friend be able to present the Bill to the House to speed this up?

Mr. Clarke: The Bill should come before the House in the next month or two. There will be considerable other preparatory work, and I cannot see privatisation being practicable or possible before the second half of this year at the earliest.

Mr. Morgan: Will the Minister tell the House what investment proposals he has before him from the British Steel Corporation? If he has none, will he explain to the House whether that causes him any concern, as the last raft of investment proposals from the BSC were made just over two years ago and are coming to an end? If anyone in the City is contemplating investment in the industry, or if the workers themselves were to believe that one could have a steel industry that could rely on past investment and not have investment proposals for perhaps two or three years, to have a healthy-looking balance sheet with a nice-looking bottom line just for the period of privatisation, would he not agree that that would be a serious confidence trick to play on any investor in the steel industry?

Mr. Clarke: A continuous process of investment is required in the steel industry and investment is taking place in various plants, including Ravenscraig. I have no proposals before me requiring the Government's formal consent, but they are likely to come in the near future and we do not intend to stop investment in the run-up to privatisation. Any proposals for further investment in continuous casting in Wales, for example, would be considered favourably by the Government, provided that they satisfy the usual commercial tests that we have to apply.

Mr. Holt: Would my right hon. and learned Friend care to note, when he next speaks to the chairman of British Steel, that the North Skelton brass band in my constituency, sponsored by British Steel, has just made a record with Mr. Acker Bilk and that some of the proceeds from the record will pay for schoolchildren from the Grangetown school in Redcar to go to Australia for the bicentenary celebrations? They will be the only musicians from this country. Well done, British Steel.

Mr. Clarke: I am glad that British Steel scores success stories, other than just returns on capital. British Steel is an important part of the community in the north-east and I am glad that it is helping to take north-eastern music down under.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: In the light of the absence of major investment proposals, just how responsible is it to flog this major national asset back to the private sector, which has such a bad record on investment, particularly in steel? How irresponsible is it to do so when stock exchanges are falling?

Mr. Clarke: British Steel has an extremely good record of investment. The hon. Gentleman is mistaken if he assumes that, because there are no formal proposals requiring the Government's consent at present, British Steel has stemmed its investment effort. That is not the case. This is a continuous process and major schemes of investment must come forward for Government approval, which will be readily given, provided that they make commercial sense. That is something that we leave largely to British Steel in the first place.

Export Promotion

11. Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what he is doing to reduce the business burdens currently facing British exporters.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government are committed to promoting enterprise and to minimising and reducing burdens on business. As part of the new enterprise initiative announced yesterday, the Department's export services will be made more attractive and more accessible to firms, particularly smaller firms.

Mr. McLoughlin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer. Does he agree that, whatever the Government do, the most important thing for exporters is free and fair trade? To that extent I welcome his earlier answer about the improvement in sales to Japan, but does he agree that, however much the Government may help now, more must be done to ensure free and fair trade throughout the world, including the Japanese economy?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend is entirely right. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary is on his way back from Japan. The House has long recognised his gifts in combining courtesy and firmness, which he will have deployed in Japan. However cordial the atmosphere at those meetings, he will have told his hosts that we shall judge them by the results in the aftermath.

Mr. Pike: Does that answer mean that the Government now recognise the importance of getting manufacturing industries into export surplus? On 10 December 1986 the Minister told me from the Dispatch Box that it was neither the business nor the responsibility of the Government to get manufacturing industries into export surplus.

Mr. Clark: The Government have a role to play, principally in an advisory capacity. The Government must help manufacturers, especially small firms which have not yet broken into export markets, with guidance and encouragement on how to break into those markets, how to cope with form-filling, how to assess the possibilities of different markets and how to maintain themselves in the difficult early periods. In all those categories the new enterprise initiative will be extremely helpful, beamed as it is on smaller businesses.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: Is my hon. Friend aware of t recent excellent export figures announced by the Briti Textile Confederation, which show that last year Briti exports to most major European countries increased by to 20 per cent. and exports to Japan increased by 23 p cent.? Is he equally aware of the grave disquiet of ma carpet manufacturers about the illegal subsidies given one of our major competitors—Belgium—to its carp manufacturers? I have in mind especially the payment the Belgian Government of £3·5 million to Beaulieu, t biggest carpet manufacturer in the world, which, despi a recent European Court ruling, has not been repaid. W my hon. Friend make representations at the highest lev to make sure that it is repaid and that similar practices c not recur?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend is right to draw attentic to the achievements of the textile industry, which has mac a notable recovery from its serious difficulties — recovery in no small measure due to our maintenance the multi-fibre arrangement, which I hope will continue exist for some years.

As my hon. Friend said, there has been an especial flagrant breach of the understandings, with the Belgia subsidising their carpet industry. We continue to pursu the matter. Recently, we made representations to th Belgian Government. So far there appears to have been n response to the judgment of the European Court, but assure my hon. Friend that we treat the matter with th utmost gravity and will continue to maintain pressure unt satisfaction is achieved.

Mr. Blair: Will the Minister be more specific about ho the new Government gimmick, the department enterprise, is supposed to help export promotion? Can h point in this document to one penny of extra cas resources committed or to a glimmer of a new idea?

Mr. Clark: The hon. Member for Dagenham (M Gould) has not yet surfaced during this Question Time, s we must be content with the repetitious performance of th hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). He ha mentioned the matter several times. The fact that there no additional money may upset Opposition Members, bu it is a source of satisfaction to Conservative Members tha we are achieving those results without additiona expenditure. As my right hon. and learned Friend th Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said, we must adap to changed circumstances and introduce more sophistica tion and selectivity. We believe that the results will justif our actions.

Mr. Brazier: Will my hon. Friend consider the impac of the dock labour scheme on the country's exporters?

Mr. Clark: That is a subject for my hon. Friends at th Department of Employment, which I vacated not all tha recently.

Space Industry

12. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Chancellor of the Duch weof Lancaster what further action he intends taking t promote and safeguard British interests in the spac industry.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am discussing with Unite Kingdom companies the space projects to which the attach importance, and we are taking a fresh look at United Kingdom civil space activities, both nationally and in the European Space Agency.

Mr. Ross: When will the Minister be able to tell us exactly what he intends to do? Some of us supported him when he came back from his meeting in Europe. He will recall that he said at the time that he was going to revamp the British National Space Centre. When can we hear the proposals, and when will those working in the industry know what those proposals are, so that they can start planning to deal with the losses which they say they will incur as a result of being excluded from programmes in Europe—regardless of whether those programmes are good or bad—because of the decision not to participate?

Mr. Clarke: We have made no cut in our present plans. As I have said, I am discussing with companies how they see the future Indeed, I have arranged meetings with the managements of two important companies tomorrow.

Obviously, we wish to reach conclusions over the next month or two. However, I see this as a continuing process of ensuring that we obtain good commercial and scientific value out of the commitment to space that we retain.

Mr. Wilkinson: Important as it is to listen to the views of commercial companies, it is for Governments to have a strategic vision of the importance of space activities, for their strategic interest and also for their commercial benefits. That is the case in the Soviet Union, the People's Republic of China, the Indian sub-continent, Japan and 13 of the 14 countries in the European Space Agency—particularly, of course, France, which has kept Europe in the space business.

Mr. Clarke: The strategic view that the Government have to take must have some aims, and those aims must be commercial, scientific and consistent with the public interest. With respect to my hon. Friend, it is not good enough to point to other countries and say that if they spend a certain proportion of their gross domestic product on space we must do the same. India is always cited. I believe that it spends its money on education satellites, for understandable reasons. We are already spending large sums in the space industry, and we are committed to continuing to do so, but, talking to private companies, we find a wide range of views on what our commercial and scientific objectives should be. We must also explore with them the prospect of the private sector putting a bit more money into the efforts that it wishes to pursue.

Mr. Stott: The Minister is only too well aware of our views on his recent performance at The Hague. They are not very complimentary. Notwithstanding that, however, will he tell us what Government policy will be in respect of companies that are currently being funded for, and are engaged in, work on European Space Agency projects—particularly Logica, which is a leading multinational team of companies developing software for all of the Columbus programme, not just the polar platform? What will happen to projects such as that, and those developed by British Aerospace, in the future, given his statement at The Hague?

At the same time, perhaps the Minister will remind his hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) that the Wigan metropolitan brass band is also going to Australia for the bicentennial celebrations.

Mr. Clarke: We decided at The Hague that we were not going to join certain optional programmes. I have met the executives from Logica, which is one of the organisations affected. We shall get work in those projects in which we choose to participate, and not in those in which we choose not to participate.

The way to judge such matters is not simply to say that a company will receive a contract and that therefore we must participate. We might as well give Logica the cheque if that is our sole interest. We are prepared to fund any work in which we trust that British companies will obtain a large proportion of the contracts available, as long as we are pursuing serious commercial and scientific objectives.

I am delighted to hear about the brass band from Wigan, but I do not think that it is likely to be able to travel to Australia by Hotol in the very near future.

Mr. Sayeed: Does my right hon. and learned Friend's Department believe that Hotol has commercial potential?

Mr. Clarke: Work is just about to be completed on what is called a proof of concept study. When we have the results of that to hand, I intend to have further discussions with the companies that have been involved with the Government in taking the project so far.

Inner-city Policy

14. Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many people in his Department are employed on inner-city policy.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Inner-city policy is an important part of my Department's responsibilities and all members of staff take account of it in their work. Policy is co-ordinated by the inner cities unit, which employs 26 staff. There are also 88 people in the inner-city task forces, as well as some staff in my regional offices who work with the interdepartmental city action teams.

Mr. Allen: What policies does the right hon. and learned Gentleman have to assist the outer cities?

Mr. Clarke: The outer cities are benefiting considerably from the general revival in the British economy and the rapid fall in the level of unemployment. I agree that there are outer estates of some cities where social problems and the problems associated with unemployment are just as severe as those found in inner-city areas. Any lessons found while we develop new policies in inner cities which promote the physical redevelopment of cities and training and employment opportunities for their residents can happily be applied to outer-city districts as we go along.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: My right hon. and learned Friend's reply will be a great encouragement to those of us who represent rural constituencies which nevertheless contain towns which have similar social and economic problems to those experienced in some inner cities. I am delighted to hear that he will pass on any solutions.

Mr. Clarke: We help with the development of employment—creating activity in rural areas through such organisations as the Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas. I am sure my hon. Friend agrees that the problems in rural areas are sometimes different in nature and background from those in cities, but anything that we develop which speeds up the physical redevelopment of cities and the creation of new work and business opportunities ought to be applied wherever it is relevant.

Mr. Cabora: I do not know whether to offer the Minister congratulations or commiserations on the announcement that was made just before Christmas, now that he has responsibility for co-ordinating all the Government's inner-city policies. In that position, will he address the problems of ignorance and utter confusion in inner cities about grant regimes and the Government's policy towards inner cities? Will he respond to the ever-growing calls, which now embrace the Confederation of British Industry, the Trades Union Congress, local authorities and the churches, which produced "Faith in the City", and the Prince of Wales, who only a few weeks ago said that the Government must take account of local authorities and respond to local needs and opinions? Will the Minister produce a White Paper in the near future setting out how policies for inner cities will be co-ordinated?

Mr. Clarke: By making the appointment my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister clearly felt that we needed to explain more clearly the policies that we are developing. The Government know exactly what the relationship is between urban development corporations, inner-city task forces, city action teams and enterprise zones. We work well together and will continue to do so. Where co-ordination is called for, as I work for the Prime Minister, I look forward to being involved. There will certainly be a White Paper, which we hope will encourage yet more private sector companies to become involved with us and local authorities which want to take a positive view of these matters. In my work so far I have worked closely with Conservative-controlled city authorities in Nottingham and Wolverhampton, and Labour-controlled ones in Birmingham and Hartlepool. The hon. Gentleman knows, given where he stands in the Labour party, that there are some councils where it is rather more difficult to work.

Mr. Tim Smith: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the key to a successful inner-city policy is not the number of people employed in his or any other Department, but the extent to which successful co-ordination, now, I am glad to say, organised by my right hon. and learned Friend, encourages private sector investment in inner-city areas and the jobs that go with it?

Mr. Clarke: I agree strongly with my hon. Friend. Some Opposition Members judge any policy by how many staff it employs and how much public money it spends. We judge these things by results, and they are best achieved by bringing private sector business, initiative and employment back into inner cities. That is what we are trying to do.

Manufactured Goods

15. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the latest balance of trade in manufactured goods.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the first 11 months of 1987 there was a deficit on trade in manufactures of £6·5 billion.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Minister now tell us the whole truth, which is that his Government have managed the remarkable feat of turning a surplus of over £5 billion in 1978 into a deficit of over £6 billion in 1987, that this deficit is the worst ever recorded in Britain's industrial history and that it is a direct consequence of the aby failure of the Government's economic and indus strategy?

Mr. Clark: It is not a function of economic policy a In fact, half the deficit is comprised of semi-manufac and intermediate finished manufactured products w are used for production in this country and contribu employment. Approximately the other half is accou for by consumer choice. The Government are not s giant purchasing agency on behalf of the British consu Why does the hon. Member not speak to his constituents? Why does he not ask them why they p foreign goods? Why does he not admonish them? It w not put his vote up, but he might learn something fro

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree tha best hope for manufacturing industry is the creation genuine internal market in Europe by 1992?

Mr. Clark: The creation of the internal market will us a consumer market of some 330 million people. It be the largest in the world, larger than the United St or Japan. Progress is being made towards the remov barriers, which should bring about that market by 1 The Internal Market Council on which I represent Department, meets every month in Brussels Luxembourg.

Mr. James Lamond: Is the Minister aware that textile industry's contribution to the balance of trade be severely damaged by the recent very liberal agreen reached with Turkey on the import of yarns into country, which appears to me to undermine the MF which he spoke so warmly a few minutes ago? Is Department looking at that?

Mr. Clark: I have looked at it very closely and w be very glad to do something about it, but unfortuna the industry cannot produce evidence of injury. I produces evidence of serious injury, it will enable m take action to reduce the volume of imports from Tur I have been at great pains to try to secure such evide but none has been forthcoming.

Mr. Latham: Is my hon. Friend aware Conservative Members, at any rate, do not take the sto age view that nothing matters but manufactured goo We are surprised that Opposition Members have interest in the output of hundreds of thousands of pe who work in tourism, insurance and many other n manufacturing industries.

Mr. Clark: Yes, that is true, but I will not go the wh way with my hon. Friend. I attach great importance to performance of manufacturing industry and I regret much that we are still in deficit in that sector. It is the c sector in our whole trade balance where we are in def I am optimistic that it will slowly be corrected, beca exports are rising faster than imports, but I att importance to the sector and I do not believe that service sector, however successful and however m people it employs, can ever be an effective substitute it.

Commercial Vehicles

20. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Chancellor of Duchy of Lancaster what figures he has for the level exports and imports of light commercial vehicles in first half of 1987.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have run off the dial, so the House should be prepared for some extemporisation in the answer.

The value of exports in the first half of 1987 was £61 million; the figure for imports was £148 million. These figures represent an improvement in the balance of trade of some £30 million over the comparable period for 1986.

Mr. Oppenheim: Is it not true that many of the problems suffered by the commercial vehicle industry were caused by Government meddling in the 1960s and 1970s, which forced factories to go to uneconomic parts of the country and which forced Leyland Trucks to cross-subsidise Austin Morris cars? Is it not also true that there was poor management and appalling labour relations? Is it not encouraging that under the more profitable economic climate which the Goverment have helped to produce our commercial vehicle industry is beginning to produce better results?

Mr. Clark: I agree with my hon. Friend. I regretted it very much when Leyland Trucks, which was one of the finest truck makers in the world at that time, lost its independence. It has taken some time to effect the recovery which is now so clearly evident in the figures, which show, as I said, an improvement of some £30 million over last year.

Questions to Ministers

3.31 pm

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The point of order arises directly out of questions today. You will have noted on the Order Paper that in the first 21 questions which were likely to be reached, four had been put down by hon. Members who belong to the Liberal party or the SDP. Not one of those hon. Members has been present. Do you agree that that is a gross discourtesy to you and to the House? Do you also agree that those who put down questions, and who were not fortunate to be high enough on the Order Paper but who have patiently waited, find it frustrating that those hon. Members cannot be bothered to turn up to ask their questions?

Mr. Speaker: I am not certain that that is a matter for me.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (Derbyshire, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You have to keep a balance between the parties. On yesterday's statement by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, 34 hon. Members were called. You called fifth in that session the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), who I believe is the Alliance spokesman on trade and industry, yet he has not had the decency or the courtesy to be in the House today for questions to the Department.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I think I can deal with this matter. It is a courtesy that if hon. Members cannot be present for questions they should let the Chair know so that those questions are not called. That happened in some cases today. As to the statement yesterday, I hope that hon. Members who were not called then got some happiness by having been called today, as I had promised.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Chair has been placed in some difficulty today. We all appreciate the problem of you having to check whether questions had been crossed off; some had and some had not. We understand the dilemma. It was put to me that in the merger the Liberals and the SDP were going through what is known as a negative care terminal episode. That is an American medical expression for death. I think you could resolve the problem, if you wanted to, by finding a name for them. I have got two. One is Lombard—I shall not tell you what it stands for. The other is PVC—plastic politics.

Mr. Speaker: Ingenious.

Later——

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Is it proper through you, Mr. Speaker, for me to help the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who drew the House's attention to the fact that today has seen the birth of a new stillborn party? The hon. Gentleman was seeking to find out the title of that party. I understand that the chosen name is the SLD, which is an acronym for "sold down the river" party.

Debates (Calling of Speakers)

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you give guidance to the House in regard to the calling of speakers? On previous occasions when the matter was raised, you said that you would call a speaker from the Liberal Benches and from the SDP Benches, and on many occasions you treat them separately in debates. Can you give any guidance about what will happen under the new situation, whatever that may be? How will the group of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), which is quite separate and refused to merge, be allocated time?

Mr. Speaker: I cannot recollect that I have ever discussed or given guidance about how the occupant of the Chair calls hon. Members. It would by very unwise to do that.

Medical Examination of Children at R

3.39 pm

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): I be

move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the relating to child care to enable a social worker or he visitor who believes a child to be at risk to require the pa or guardian to produce the child for medical examina within three days.

The intention of the Bill is to fill a gap in the pow available to those charged with the onerous responsibil of child protection. It is estimated that 150 to 200 child are killed annually by their parents or guardians. There about 30,000 children on local authority at-risk regist None of us can fail to experience a strong emotio reaction to such cases. We have seen in recent mon many sensational and censorious responses to the rep of physical and sexual child abuse and to cases involv the death of a child.

However, sadly, there is nothing new about child ab and neglect. We may have updated our way understanding and describing the syndrome, descriptions of barbarous treatment are widespread literature and popular culture, with tales of infantic ritual sacrifice, mutilation, flogging and exploitati Legislation was introduced to protect animals in 1822, the first children's charter was not introduced until 18

Since the 1973 Maria Colwell tragedy, there have b more than 20 similar inquiries into cases of child abu Each inquiry is a costly, frequently confrontational highly charged event in which the social workers are often treated as whipping boys. We have to find a w forward that takes into account the lessons we le following Mrs. Justice Butler-Sloss's Cleveland inquiry which there appears to have been an idiosyncratic, ov zealous approach by one group of professionals a parental rights seem to have been disregarded.

We should also learn from the lessons of the harrow series of tragic individual cases such as Heidi Kose Kimberley Carlile, Jasmine Beckford and Tyra Hen where somehow the child slipped through the net a where, even in the light of professional or public anxie the child was simply not seen and the parents' sensitivit appear to have been given excessive weight and the chil rights disregarded.

Our present child care law, as everyone acknowledg is untidy and unsatisfactory. The legislation is spread o several Acts and is in need of simplification a structuring into one new Act. There is widespread suppo for the simplification and modification set out in the Wh Paper "The Law on Child Care and Family Service That major overhaul of child care law is eagerly awaite It is intended "to provide a clearer framework for the provision of child c services to families and for the protection of children at risk

Few hon. Members are aware of the skill required treat or assess child abuse cases. The task of the soc worker, health visitor, general practitioner and othe entrusted with child protection is highly skilled a requires careful judgment.

There will have been widespread encouragem obtained from the remarks of my right hon. Friend t Prime Minister yesterday when she referred to such ca which pose a child is being abused, neglected or ill-treated. It is not an easy question for anyone to answer, but it is supremely important and involves social workers, legislators and neighbours."—[Official Report, 12 January 1988; Vol. 125, c. 142.]

Those involved in child protection frequently have to walk a tightrope between building up parental competence and confidence and encouraging parents to succeed in the task of child rearing and, at the same time, not forgetting that their first duty must be the protection of the child rather than the parents.

If there are clear and serious grounds for worry about a child, there are powers available to obtain a place of safety order allowing the child to be removed and detained for 28 days. Section 40 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 enables a magistrate to authorise a police constable to enter the premises. What is lacking is a lower order, an order to ensure that a child about whom there is not deep and widespread concern is seen.

It is very easy for parents to say that the child is away or absent. It is not only abusing families who dislike the intervention of health visitors or social workers in their everyday lives. The purpose behind my Bill is to ensure that there is a power to require the parents to produce the child for a medical examination. They escort the child to the medical examination. They are not handing over the parental rights and the child is not removed traumatically from their presence.

In the review of child care law the Government propose a new emergency protection order. This makes up for many of the shortcomings of the place of safety order. The parents have greater say in the procedure and it does not last for such a long time. It is not good enough, however, to argue that this provides the minimal power which would be required to ensure that the child receives a medical assessment with the least possible offence being taken by the parents about interference with what many of us regard as our private business.

I believe that the new minimal power outlined in my Bill will play an integral part, with the many other initiatives and measures that have been developed in recent years. The highly regarded chief inspector of social services at the Department of Health and Social Security, Bill Utting, has tirelessly sought to improve standards of care, emphasising that the first priority must be given to the child, clarifying the powers already available for those involved in child protection. Consideration has been given to better practice guidelines for social workers, nurses and doctors in the clinical diagnosis of sexual abuse and the conduct of child abuse inquiries.

Other Departments are also involved. The Home Office has taken steps to allow children to provide evidence by video link and to remove the need that their evidence should be corroborated. In the education service, there is a greater awareness of the responsibilities of and the contribution that can be made by teachers.

Many of us are looking forward to the implementation of the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) to amend the Ch Young Persons Act 1986, which allows greate and control over those who have been sent ho from care. Certainly, the Tyra Henry an Beckford cases might have benefited from suc

Social Security Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

Clause 1

ATTENDANCE ALLOWANCE

3.49 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 15, leave out from 'be' to the end of line 17 and insert 'immediately available'.

The amendment deals with a decision in the case of Mrs. Dorothy Moran with regard to attendance allowance that was first made by the relevant authorities and then overturned by the Court of Appeal.

Mrs. Moran's application for the night time attendance allowance was turned down on the grounds that, although there seemed to be little doubt that she needed the assistance and support of her husband, he was not necessarily awake throughout all the hours of the night. However, clear evidence was given to the board that he was quite capable of waking should his wife suffer a crisis that was totally without warning.

Mrs. Moran's application was rejected, but on advice she went to the Court of Appeal, which overturned the previous decision. Her case has now gone back to the board for further consideration. It would be helpful, now or at some later stage, if the Minister could pursue this matter. Even though the case has returned to the board, Mrs. Moran has received neither judgment nor money. Clearly, that was not what the Court of Appeal envisaged when it granted her appeal. I do not believe that the Government had that in mind when they spoke of their intention to make sure that cases in the pipeline were sympathetically considered. Therefore, I hope that the Minister will agree to pursue the matter. I wish to put on record that I have been asked to make that plea by my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). Unfortunately he is attending the Select Committee on Social Services and is unable to be present to raise this matter.

We hope that the Government will give some consideration to the proposal in our amendment. I hope that they will agree to consult—perhaps a little more widely than they have done on some other alternatives—about their new wording. Throughout our debates on the Bill, the Government have insisted that all they are seeking to do is to restore the law to what it was before the Moran judgment was given. We have expressed the anxiety, felt by many involved in such work, that the new wording carries with it certain dangers and could be interpreted more restrictively than the wording before the Moran judgment. I recognise that the Minister has already said that he will consider some of the alternatives that have been proposed, but he has said that the Government remain of the view that their wording will mean that the law is no tighter than it was before the Moran judgment.

With the greatest possible respect to the Minister, it is clear that the Court of Appeal did not agree with the Government that the wording previously used in the Social Security Act 1975 gave effect to their in Therefore, I hope that there will be wider cons especially with the charities which represent people and which deal with the operation of at allowance.

We are especially worried about someone hav awake to qualify for the night time condition introduction of the words "at frequent interv believe that those words may lead to a interpretation of the law. Obviously, at present we case law to consider regarding the Governme formulation, but the word "frequent" is used rega daytime condition for attendance allowance, Court of Appeal has said that, in that context, "f means several times and not just once or twice.

The reason for having slightly different condi qualify for the payment of night time cover and ni care is that, by obvious definition, night time care onerous on the carer. Therefore, it has always b case that it is slightly easier to satisfy the nig condition than the daytime condition. We are that, as the law is now proposed, the night time c may become more stringent and on all fours v operation of the day time condition.

I must remind the Minister of the problems th even now under the existing law. He may recall tha context of the denial of attendance allowance to under the age of two, observations have been mad children suffering from thalassaemia major and that those children have to wear a pump to admini drug Desferal during the night, and the difficult that causes.

The Minister may also recall that in the context debate attention was drawn in one particular exa the way in which the parents of the child involved get up at regular intervals, and so have badly di nights. The problems of those parents are not rec by the award of attendance allowance. We are that, even now, people who many of us might think be more seriously considered for attendance allowa not meeting the conditions, and obviously that colo anxiety that this problem may be exacerbated in

I have received representations from officials of of Sheffield who remain worried that a large nu people will be deprived of attendance allowance new wording and who have drawn attention problems of those with mental illness, of those su from Alzheimer's disease and of diabetics wh hypoglycaemic attacks. They are often unable to help, but may be able to put carers on the alert. It enough for someone to be present and able to resp an appeal for assistance, although that person sleeping lightly, but alertly.

We believe that the wording that the Governm putting into law is more stringent than at prese carries a danger that people who are now able to the tests for attendance allowance might not meet t conditions. I hope the Minister will recognise that a serious attempt to offer alternative wording wh courts can interpret. We recognise that the commis suggested that they might have difficulties in extra principle from the decision in the Moran case. W that the alternative wording that we are offerin enable them to extract the prinicple and prevent the of attendance allowance to those who at present wo awarded it.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Michael Portillo): I shall begin where the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) began and, indeed, where the whole matter began, with Mrs. Moran, and with the point which the hon. Lady raised on behalf of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) who, obviously, has shown the closest attention to that case and the issues that it has raised.

It is true that Mrs. Moran has not yet received her judgment. The attendance allowance board is an independent adjudicating authority and I cannot comment on its deliberations. However, I shall explain to the House what the present position is. Following the Court of Appeal judgment, the full attendance allowance board reconsidered Mrs. Moran's case in the light of the judgment in May 1987. Details of its provisional conclusions were sent to Mrs. Moran on 19 May together with copies of all the evidence considered by the board.

In keeping with the board's usual practice, Mrs. Moran was then asked to submit comments on the provisional conclusions and any further evidence that she might have to support her case. She responded on 25 September through Mr. Nicholas Warren of the Birkenhead resource unit, who sent the board the submission on her behalf, together with the report of the consultant neurologist, Dr. Chadwick, and statements from Mr. Moran and Mr. Pugh of the British Epilepsy Association. The full board reconsidered its provisional conclusions in the light of the papers from Mr. Warren and a reasoned statement of its final decision should be sent shortly to Mrs. Moran and her representatives. By that, I understand that she will be hearing from the board within a few days.

I have listened with great care to the hon. Lady's arguments and am grateful for the constructive spirit in which she has spoken, as she did so often in Committee. Much of what has been said today echoes the points made in Committee. I remind the House of what we think the aim of the allowance is and always has been. It is to recognise the extra cost and disruption to normal family life that arises from the attendance needs of severely disabled people.

At night, when the normal state of the members of the household is that of sleep and quiet, disruption can be caused because the disabled person requires frequent attention with his bodily functions or because his condition requires that someone should continually supervise him—that is, be awake and watching over him for a prolonged period or at frequent intervals so that he does not put himself or other people at risk of substantial danger. That is the basis on which attendance allowance operated before the Court of Appeal's decision in March last year.

I do not think anyone would dispute that disruption of a household at night by the attendance needs of a severely disabled person is the proper basis for entitlement to the allowance. The Court of Appeal, however, pushed the scope of the allowance wider than that. Its finding was that in some circumstances the disabled person's need for attendance did not cause disruption. Continual supervision might be exercised even by someone who was asleep, albeit ready to wake up if and when danger occurred. Such danger does not have to be common, with the proviso that it is not so remote a possibility that it should reasonably be disregarded.

That is why the Government were the judicial interpretation of continual super which was not consistent with our previous of what was entailed. In our view, interpretation was no longer a satisfactor the criteria that must be satisfied. the House that the application of clause 1 will have the same practical effect as was the situation before the Court of Appeal judgment. We oppose broadening the attendance allowance in the way that resulted from the Moran judgment.

The hon. Lady made the point that it is important to give clear guidance to the courts in this matter. The "immediately available" formulation suffers from the problem that it is not a clear form of guidance to disabled people, the courts or the other bodies that we will ask to enforce the legislation. The form of words that we have suggested will prove workable, subject to the assurance I have given to the hon. Lady—that I want to check it further with the lawyers and draw to their attention the points she has made.

Mrs. Beckett: This has been an interesting, although brief, exchange. I recall that Ministers said in Committee that the effect of the Moran judgment would be financially neutral and that the only reason why they were persevering with the clause, however worded, was to tidy up the law, because they had not been able to abstract principles from the Moran judgment. However, in a sense, we were hoping to offer them in the amendment a formulation that would enable them to extract principles that would tidy up the law without, perhaps, tightening it as we fear; and also, perhaps, to give effect to the law as the Court of Appeal had wished it to be. However, I am grateful to the Minister for his agreement to consult again and more widely. That will be helpful to those in another place when they examine this part of the Bill, and I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mrs. Beckett: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 9, at end insert:—

'(3) In subsection 35(2A) of the Social Security Act 1975, after "prescribed", in the first place where that word occurs, there shall be inserted the words "or who requires parenteral nutrition other than as an in-patient in a hospital or similar institution".'.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross). Sadly, I see he is not with us at this moment, but I hope that he will join us shortly. He drew to my attention and, through me, to the attention of the Committee, the problems of patients who suffer such illnesses as Crohn's disease and who find themselves, in order to sustain life and receive nourishment, reliant upon a form of treatment called total parenteral nutrition. That was unfamiliar to me and, I think, to most hon. Members on the Committee, but I understand from my hon. Friend that apart from the interest that he has developed from his constituency casework, it is a treatment which — fortunately or unfortunately—he has undergone himself. It involves the placement of a central venous catheter which lies in a vein above the right side of the heart and exits through the skin at the front of the chest.

I am confident that my hon. Friend can address the circumstances of the treatment much better than I can, as he has had the experience, but the main point in relation to attendance allowance and the conditions under which the necessity for treatment arises is the comparison that has been drawn between total parenteral nutrition, because of which a patient relies on the support of a machine to sustain life, and renal dialysis.

It may be within the memory of a number of hon. Members that, at first, renal dialysis did not automatically qualify a patient for the payment of attendance Over a period, so many cases had been turned d attendance allowance board, which was op approach to these cases that was more stri Parliament felt was justified, that, after a coupl experience, in 1976 Parliament decided to take out of the hands of the attendance allowance that someone who was forced to undergo renal sustain life should automatically be awarded allowance. I believe that that is the only case automatic entitlement.

We were, and are, asking the House to co extent to which patients who must receive home nutrition may fall within a similar category. Ce treatment is life-sustaining, involves many diffic might be found by many people hard to h endure. We were anxious lest the board, albei seemed to it the right reasons, adopted ra standards of judgment for this condition too therefore sought to raise the issue whether Parliament should step in and make the qualifying condition for the award of an allowance. We have tabled the amendment beca worried that individuals are being denied allowance even though, perhaps for psychologic they have great difficulties with the operatio parenteral nutrition.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): On behalf o who, like me, have had the benefit of total nutrition, I should like to thank all hon. Mem participated in the Committee proceedings. I behalf of those who have the misfortune to have treatment for the rest of their lives in order to s and for those who, like me, were on the treatm short time.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Der (Mrs. Beckett) spoke in Committee, she r correspondence from Professor Lennard-Jones the recess he wrote me a couple of letters, and I s to quote one paragraph from his letter of 17 Dece said:

"Thank you for your courtesy in sending me a of the debate on the Social Security Bill during w Beckett made such a strong case for granting an A Allowance to all patients who give themselves nutrition at home. I am most impressed by the qua debate and the reasoned arguments put forward."

Like Professor Lennard-Jones, I was also impres I read the debate. As my hon. Friend the Me Derby, South said, I had my life saved by this and I should like to share some of my experience Minister and with hon. Members, because it ma to come to a conclusion on the matter.

In January 1985 I required major abdominal s Ninewells hospital, Dundee. That surgery saved Following surgery I was making reasonable pro suddenly, and for no apparent reason, the having been a success, I started to find it difficul myself. I was regularly sick and had diarrhoea, there seemed to be no cause. At first it was suspe it was perhaps psychological, given the surgery t required and the stress that I had gone throu consultant was of the opinion that perhaps I had ability to eat or to want to eat, or even to want to

I assure hon. Members that I was trying as could to survive, and many of my hon. Friends, i my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), came to see me and will recall that I was striving hard at that time but finding it difficult to maintain life. Eventually I was taken back into Ninewells hospital, and the staff inserted an endoscope and discovered that I was suffering from post-operative adhesions. They were not just simple post-operative adhesions, but massive ones and the consultant, Professor Cusheri said that they were among the worst post-operative adhesions that he had come across in his many years as a surgeon. Instead of the wounds inside my body healing separately, they were healing together and I was gradually choking myself to death.

There was no way in which I could feed myself by the normal method. The staff tried all sorts of treatments. They inserted internal tubes to try to feed me, but that simply added to the complications and I lost a considerable amount of weight. I was certainly not in any condition for more surgery, which was obviously what was required at that time. I did not have much to look forward to, and I can remember the day when the hospital staff tried the last method of trying to feed me. The stomach that they had created for me became solid with the infusions that I was taking in a very uncomfortable manner through a tube down my nose and throat. I thought that that was virtually the end of it.

4.15 pm

The next morning my stomach was pumped out, and a new consultant was introduced to me. He told me that his name was Chris Pennington and that he was a consultant nutritionist. He said, "Do not worry. We will look after you." I had heard that story once or twice before, and I was not convinced. The staff carefully gathered up my emaciated frame and put it in ambulance and transported me to King's Cross hospital. I then discovered this new treatment of total parenteral nutrition, and, I should like to put on record what it involves, because it is only when one hears what is involved that one appreciates the psychological stress and the problems faced by those who, unlike me, have to live with it for the rest of their lives.

At the start of the treatment, a catheter is introduced through the skin on the anterior chest, or upper abdomen, and it tunnels through the tissues to end in a large vein near the heart. The catheter cannot be seen under one's clothing and patients can engage in normal activities during the day. At night, using strict sterile precautions, and following a protocol to avoid accidents, about 3 litres of fluid, usually in one flexible, transparent plastic container, are infused slowly through the catheter. During sleep the rate of infusion is kept constant by a sophisticated volumetric pump with an audible alarm which wakes the patient when a technical fault occurs.

In the morning the patient reduces the rate of flow of the small amount of fluid remaining to allow the body to readjust to a fall in blood glucose level. The container is then disconnected. A blocking cap is placed on the end of the catheter, anticoagulant is injected and the patient resumes activity. The patient has to learn how to maintain complete sterility during all manipulations involving the catheter or nutrient solution. New skills have to be acquired for handling syringes, infusion lines and the pump and for care of the catheter and the site at which it enters the skin. Knowledge is needed complications and technique, and abou cope with them.

That all sounds fairly straightforward Members that when one has to try to de on one's chest while working a machine of one's life. People tend to give their ma my machine was called Fred. The volumetric pump, which goes tick, tick, happens during infusion, there is an aud alarm goes off, one immediately start difficult to carry out these procedures c my wife was trained while I was in Kin and she carried out the hooking up an should not have liked to do it myself appreciate the stress and the psycholog patients have to go through. I had to process to ensure that I could undergo operation, but I knew that at some stag to do away with this type of feeding and feeding.

I went back into hospital, and was th to 11 May. When I was taken into Kin my weight was 42·5 kg, which is under three weeks the hospital staff managed to at which I could again undergo fair surgery. From 24 May to 26 June I w parenteral nutrition in King's Cross hos three weeks at home. At the end of that I to feed myself and to say goodbye to gloves and to having to connect myself night and remain connected to Fred u next morning.

The only thing that sustained me was I would be using Fred for only a sho consultant kept on assuring me that at s return to a normal feeding method. possibility of my coming back to the Mark's hospital in London taking ove providing the nutrition that I required. of my illness was when I had to face the carry out my normal work and being hoo for 12 hours a day. up to 500 miles from the centre that looks after their treatment, and they do not have the confidence of being able to gain access to someone who is suitably qualified and trained, as my wife and I could that night. They may not even have access to another giving set. We had a couple of spare sets and we were able to speak to King's Cross hospital. Even after the sister who was in charge that evening had gone home she was able to speak to us on the telephone and talk us through the process to make sure that I was hooked up.

It is difficult, particularly for young and elderly people, to cope with this problem. I hope that the Minister, if he cannot say today that an attendance allowance can be given, will at least give us some assurance that individual cases will be looked at more sympathetically. It appears to me, knowing Patricia Boyle and the Boyle family very well, that the conclusion Dr. Pennington came to — that psychologically she may never be able to come to terms with this form of feeding — is something that the attendance allowance board seems to have ignored completely. It would be sad if it determined that because she is not regularly breaking down, or because someone else is able to assist her, she could not be considered for an attendance allowance.

A number of studies have been carried out on responses to the treatment, and I am sure that the Minister and his Department have studied those. I draw his attention to a study carried out by Belinda-Jane Dewar, a nursing sister, into psychological problems faced by patients who have to rely on mechanical feeding. It is a very useful and informative document. She came to the conclusion that this major advance has "created new psychological stresses for patients and their families. Since the patients' lives depend on TPN apparatus, they must accept the use of this mechanical device in order to survive. They must also adapt to the loss of normal body function and face the reality that they are permanently dependent on TPN as a substitute."

On behalf of all patients who have used TPN, I thank the Committee for taking the time to consider the matter.

I conclude by referring to a comment made by Professor Lennard-Jones in correspondence to me on 24 December last year. He said:

"It is thus important when discussing this topic not to regard these patients as healthy people who have to perform a technical exercise each night. On the contrary, they are people with a severe illness who courageously cope with it using this technique and they achieve a very high level of activity and rehabilitation."

I hope that the Minister can give some indication that those patients who have to use total parenteral nutrition from now until the end of their lives can be allowed to resume normal activities and a rehabilitated life. Certainly they would be helped if the Minister could give an indication that the attendance allowance board will look much more sympathetically at this form of treatment.

Mr. Portillo: I welcome the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) to the debate. I understand that he was the unseen moving force behind some of the debates in Committee, and he has contributed most interestingly today. I studied the amendment very seriously before coming to the debate today.

As to precisely what is and what is not at issue, what is not at issue is whether somebody who is on total parenteral nutrition can qualify for attendance allowance, because of course they can and many people do. The question before us is whether somebody who is on TPN should qualify automatically for attendance a that very reason, without any other conside case. I want the House to be clear that that i considering. To answer the first point, the question that people on TPN may in some c be able to qualify.

On the second point, I will put my cards straight away and say to the hon. Gentlem Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) th recommend acceptance of the amendmen represents an unjustified shift in the genera entitlement to disablement benefits is based o and needs arising from disability and is n specific disabling conditions or forms of should like to explain why we have r conclusion.

The House will know that attendance designed to help with the extra costs faced disabled people who need a great deal of car of frequent attention to bodily functions o supervision or watching over them to avoi danger to themselves or others. Entitlen allowance is based solely on those attendance not, apart from one specific exception, on a disabling condition or form of treatment.

The exception is those disabled pe entitlement to the allowance is based on the f are renal dialysis patients who self-dialyse. Fo it has been accepted that all people who dia have much the same attendance needs, and th sufficient to qualify for a lower rate attendanc Home dialysis patients are awarded the allow because they are receiving the treatment, individual assessment of the needs of e Recently we extended the concession to cover dialyse in hospital self-care units, and it wa treat self-dialysis in this way because th attendance is present in every case.

The amendment seeks a similar blanket co people receiving total parenteral nutrition t home. We aim to enable disabled people to rec minimum of fuss the benefits to which they entitled. The extension of the special attendanc arrangements to renal dialysis patients using se shows that we are prepared to respond po sympathetically to the changing needs of disa brought about by developments in medicin forms of treatment.

Before going down the road propos amendment, we must be certain that all TPN p the same attendance needs and that those n accepted as sufficient to satisfy the criteria for allowance without individual assessment. I argued forcefully that the attendance needs patients are just as great and universal as thos patients, and should be similarly recognised b entitlement to allowance. We have con attendance allowance board and we do not bel could justify extending to TPN patients the kin entitlement available to dialysis patients. Th experienced in assessing the attendance nee patients and has received advice from experts i of treatment.

4.30 pm

I now want to consider one of the problems that so often arise—that of conflicting medical opinion from different sources. It is true that there is a body of medical opinion that holds that all TPN patients need help and assistance with the treatment from another person. Other experts take a markedly different view. To take the extreme, in the opinion of one consultant involved with TPN, to award attendance allowance would negate the whole purpose of the treatment, which is to allow patients to lead completely independent lives to the extent of holding down full-time paid employment. Advice received from another expert is that TPN patients who are otherwise physically and mentally intact do not require attention, supervision or watching over by another person before, during or after the treatment.

I want to draw some comparisons between TPN and renal dialysis. Patients on renal dialysis must without exception keep to a strict timetable and deviation of a few hours may have catastrophic consequences. They are severely ill people with a progressive disease which causes toxic reactions. The preparation of the machine for renal dialysis takes 40 to 60 minutes. That preparation may be physically very arduous. The patient is connected by a very short tube which may be only 12 to 16 in. long. The length of the tube cannot be varied because of the law of hydrodynamics. Moreover, the connection is made via the left wrist and that effectively tethers the patient, making him practically immobile. The connection is of the friction type and it could possibly slip. The treatment causes lassitude, confusion, temperature variations and occasionally even transient heart failure through the lowering of body pressure. Such people are hardly in a state to call for help should a breakdown occur.

The timing of TPN is important, but not critical. A few hours' delay may make the patient thirsty or hungry, but will not endanger life. The preparation of the machine takes five to 10 minutes and consists of running feeding fluids through the tubing. Similarly, the length of the connection is variable from a few inches to yards depending on the pump strength. The connection is not of the bayonet type. It cannot come apart without twisting. The patient is not tethered and is able to turn over in bed and sleep comfortably. It is true that the entire apparatus weighs about 55 lb, but it need not be carried around. When the treatment is finished, TPN patients feel refreshed and often go to work. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Dundee, West would endorse that.

I am not for a moment saying that TPN patients should be excluded from attendance allowance. Undoubtedly some should receive it. I remind the House that the question is whether they should all receive it automatically. We believe that TPN patients are not a homogeneous group, all with the same attendance needs, who can be automatically accepted as satisfying the qualifying criteria.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): How many TPN patients are there?

Mr. Portillo: I will come to that in a moment.

The attendance needs of each individual patient are different. Some can cope with the treatment entirely unaided and do not need assistance from another person. Clearly it would be quite wrong to pay attendance allowance in such cases. Others may well need help and assistance, either because of other mental or physical disabilities or because they are psychologically unable to cope with the treatment. Whether these needs arise and are sufficient to qualify for attendance allowance entirely depends on the facts and circumstances of each individual patient. I think it quite right, therefore, that a TPN patient's entitlement to attendance allowance should continue to be assessed in the light of individual needs by the attendance allowance board taking account of all the physical or mental or psychological difficulties which may be present.

In response to the point raised by the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), may I say that the attendance allowance board has made it a policy to consider all TPN cases. That matter is not put out to delegated medical practitioners. All the cases—there are not many—are brought forward. Since the beginning of 1987 there have been eight TPN cases and attendance allowance has been awarded in four of them. That is a striking ratio. It means that the board has concluded in some cases that people should be entitled to the allowance.

I cannot comment specifically on the case of Miss Boyle or any other case. However, in response to a point made by the hon. Member for Derby, South in Committee, I can state that if a letter from the attendance allowance board states that it can find no evidence of mental instability, aggressive behaviour or a suicidal tendency, it does not mean that the board is stating that unless such tendencies are present the person does not qualify for attendance allowance.

The attendance allowance board is bound in its deliberations to go through a checklist of everything that might qualify a person for attendance allowance, including, as hon. Members are aware, whether a person is likely to cause himself or herself any harm. That must be considered and covered in the documentation. That is a standard form of words, but it does not mean that a TPN patient is excluded from receiving an attendance allowance or can receive it only if there is evidence of suicidal or other tendencies.

I hope that the House will realise that we have considered this point carefully. However, I regret that I cannot commend the amendment to the House. In the spirit of the contribution made by the hon. Member for Dundee, West, I undertake to draw everything that has been said in this short debate to the attention of the attendance allowance board and I will ask my officials to continue to discuss all the issues that have been raised. I am grateful to the hon. Members for Dundee, West and for Derby, South for giving us the opportunity to consider this matter.

Mrs. Beckett: Although this has been a brief debate, it has been interesting. While all hon. Members will have sympathised with the experiences related by my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross), they will have been impressed by the clear and quiet way in which he was able to describe what must have been an horrendous experience. I listened with care to the Minister. I am particularly grateful for his remarks at the end of his observations and I want to make two or three points.

We must bear in mind a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West. By definition, those who undergo TPN treatment are very seriously ill, especially those who are likely to have to undergo the treatment permanently. I recall that in Committee we drew attention to observations made in medical literature to the effect that it is especially those people who have not previously been seriously ill who are most likely—as was the case with my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West whose illness occurred unexpectedly — to face serious psychological difficulties.

Those who have already suffered a long and chronic illness and may have been in severe pain, which hopefully may have been relieved by the operations that led them to need total parenteral nutrition, may be more accustomed to suffering. They are also receiving an advantage. They are receiving a beneficial side effect to accompany their difficulties. Those people who have been struck comparatively swiftly by a serious illness and then find themselves dependent on the use of this technique to sustain life are bound to have far greater psychological difficulties. In that sense, I accept the Minister's point that obviously the circumstances will vary from case to case.

We also drew attention in Committee to medical literature that revealed the new techniques in this area. The Minister acknowledged that techniques were developing and changing. New techniques are being tested in Toronto, where a self-sealing septum is being tried. That is intended to help women patients, where there is a strong resistance to the effects of surgery, because repeated access to the catheter can be made by needle. The Minister will recall that experience there was that many patients had to reject that form of treatment because of a combination of the pain and the build-up of scar tissue and also—and very importantly—the psychological effects.

I am grateful to the Minister for confirming that, when the attendance allowance board said that Patricia Boyle was not displaying evidence of mental instability, aggressive behavour or suicidal tendencies, it was not suggesting that it would be necessary to wait until those conditions were displayed before attendance allowance could be awarded. We did not have such clarification in Committee.

As in the case of renal dialysis, I wonder whether the board is tending to go through what the Minister described as a checklist of tests, which have perhaps arisen from considering people with mental illness or handicap. Is the board giving sufficient weight to the new circumstances and to the technological change which has led to the introduction of this treatment, and is it applying the right tests to its judgment of psychological difficulties? That is an important point which should be considered by the board, and perhaps more widely. As experience develops, Parliament might well feel the need to pronounce on this matter, unless the board is able to convince us that it is using the right criteria with the right sensitivity.

I welcome the Minister's comments about the return to the board. I hope that it will consider the observations that have been made, in a spirit not of criticism, but of anxiety in the debate.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 2

INTRODUCTION OF RETIREMENT ALLOWANCE AND OTHER PROVISIONS RELATING TO INDUSTRIAL INJURIES BENEFIT

Mr. Portillo: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 3, line 24, leave out 'for the purposes of the Act is treated as having'.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 4 to 7.

Mr. Portillo: In Committee, a question was raised about the meaning of the phrase "treated as having retired", as it appears in clause 2(3). That matter was resolved, but the point was made that the terminology relating to retirement was not consistent throughout clause 2. Having considered the point further, we offer amendments Nos. 3, 4 and 6, which must be considered with amendment No. 7, under which a new subsection is inserted to clarify the terminology used in the other subsection. These technical amendments aim to standardise the wording used in the clause so that it may be better understood.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 4

INCOME SUPPORT AND CHILD BENEFIT

4.45 pm

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 4, line 21, after 'period' insert 'or when engaged in a course of education or training.'

Before I deal with the precise terms of the amendment, it would be helpful to the House if I set it in the context of the clause from which it offers a further exemption. Competition among the clauses in the Bill to see which may be regarded as most objectionable is intense. However, when history makes its judgment on the Bill it will be by clause 4 that it will be best remembered.

For 40 years, supplementary benefit, or the social security system which preceded it, has been available to any person over 16 years. This clause excludes from such benefit anybody under 18, and, remarkably, it does so in the very decade that has seen more unemployment than ever before among those who are affected by the clause.

In yesterday's debate on child benefit there was a passage of arms about what the Conservative party had meant in its manifesto when it referred to child benefit. The gulf between what it said in its manifesto at the last election and what it is doing in the clause with respect to teenagers is wider than anything that it has said in respect of child benefit. The manifesto stated:

"We will take steps to ensure that those under 18 who deliberately choose to remain unemployed are not eligible for benefit."

Perhaps it should have occurred to us why the Government felt it necessary to take those steps. After all, a battery of powers are available to the DHSS to suspend benefit from anybody who it thinks chooses to be unemployed. It is simply not possible to choose to be unemployed and to claim benefit. I suspect, as many hon. Members no doubt do from the evidence of their constituency surgeries, that the powers against those suspected of choosing unemployment are being used far more readily and more easily than before.

Perhaps we should have been suspicious. We would have been correct in our suspicions, because, as the clause shows, the Government are not suspending benefit from those under 18 who deliberately choose to remain unemployed, but are suspending benefit from anybody under 18 who is not employed. It is an absolute ban. The proposal is as lonely and friendless as any adolescent whom it will affect.

[Mr. Robin Cook]

I noticed, when reading the Official Report of the Committee proceedings, that the Under-Secretary of State and the Minister referred to YTS in glowing terms and appeared to pray in aid the success of YTS as the reason why it was no longer necessary to offer supplementary benefit or income support to 16 and 17-year-olds. This is not the place to debate YTS and I am sure that you, Madam Deputy Speaker, would call me to order if I attempted to do so. However, if the Government claim that the success of YTS is the reason why we no longer need to offer income support to 16 and 17-year-olds, they should listen to what is said by the people who administer the YTS scheme and made it the success that the Minister claims.

Everybody associated with YTS has begged the Government not to proceed with the clause. The MSC has persistently emphasised that it regards it as important that YTS is a voluntary scheme, both for the employer and for the young person. The youth training board of the MSC, which administers the YTS, has emphasised its policy that YTS should be voluntary. The Institute of Careers Officers Ltd., which the Under-Secretary of State prayed in aid in Committee, has stressed to the Government that YTS should be voluntary and not a system of conscription.

To all those bodies, it is highly appropriate to the success of YTS that it should be voluntary. The willingness of youngsters to enter the scheme and make a success of their place on the scheme depends on their doing so voluntarily and not being conscripted. All hon. Members who have achieved my exalted years must be familiar with the fact that one can get an adolescent to do something much more successfully when one has persuaded him to believe that he thought of it first and that it was his choice, rather than ordering him to do it.

Miss Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): That is also true of Ministers.

Mr. Cook: As my hon. Friend says, that is also true of the Government. I shall endeavour to persuade them that they think that the clause is wrong and should be withdrawn.

If we were to consider the poverty lobby, it would not be possible to find anybody in the voluntary sector, responsible for welfare policy, to support this proposal. I suspect that we would not find anybody employed by the DHSS who would support it either, if people only dared to speak their minds. This measure will cause hardship to young people and, as everybody in the welfare debate knows, will increase household poverty.

There are some spectacular exceptions, such as His Royal Highness Prince Edward, but, by and large, those young people who find it difficult to obtain useful, remunerative work are in households with below average incomes. They are in households where parents are least able to support teenagers, who end up with no income of their own, but it would be inappropriate to develop that point.

It would be inappropriate to do that, because the clause is inappropriate to a Social Security Bill. The motive that has inspired the clause and the measure does not come from a consideration of equity or income support. The motive that inspires this proposal is the Government's policy in the labour market consistently to drive down the wages of young workers by excluding them from the protection of the wages councils, and by introducing young workers' schemes designed to subsidise poverty wages.

This is merely the latest step in a number of measures taken by the Government to make it more difficult for teenagers to resist any job, however badly paid, however poor a future it may offer and however temporary its nature. Ironically, it is precisely because they have created that labour market that this measure is spectacularly inappropriate to the context of that labour market. They have exposed teenagers to a labour market in which the jobs they obtain are increasingly casual, temporary and seasonal.

The life experience of many teenagers alternates between employment and unemployment. Survey after survey has shown that one in five young people aged under 18 have a chance of being unemployed within the next three months, and that one in eight teenagers are employed in a temporary or part-time job. The lifestyle of that large chunk of the teenage work force alternates between intervals out of work and intervals in work. The clause states that when they are out of work they will receive no benefit, and that while they are in work they will be expected to pay contributions towards unemployment and social security benefits.

The amendment seeks to widen the exemptions and to exclude another group of teenagers from the scope of the clause. In Committee, the Under-Secretary of State read into the record a list of the present, narrow exemptions. I am disappointed that there is no open exemption for 16 and 17-year-olds who are obliged to leave home because of physical abuse or because they are in danger from incest. The only exemption that is conceded in their case is that they will qualify for income support during the period when child benefit would otherwise have been payable to their parents. They will qualify only for the bridging period of three or four months until a YTS place becomes available.

As the Under-Secretary of State will appreciate, the problem with that is that the YTS allowance is not calculated to meet a trainee's housing costs. Many of the voluntary organisations which cater specifically for the needs of teenagers who have left home because they no longer have a place there have no idea how they will function if those teenagers cannot pay their rents because they can no longer obtain benefit.

Other groups of teenagers are exempted, but the exemptions are extremely limited. I was pleased to note that pregnant mothers will be exempt from the scope of the clause and be allowed to claim income support — not indefinitely, but at any rate for longer than the bridging allowance period. That is an important category, because there are 50,000 teenage pregnancies every year. However, on reading the provision for pregnant mothers, I was startled to discover that they will qualify for income support for only the last 11 weeks of pregnancy. For the first six months they will not be entitled to social security. Perhaps the Under-Secretary of State will explain how he expects a 16 or 17-year-old girl who is four or five months pregnant to obtain employment, or, for that matter, to obtain a YTS place and qualify for a YTS allowance. She will have to wait until the sixth month, when eventually she will qualify for income support.

The Under-Secretary of State may wish to rely on the other categories that are exempted. There will be exemptions in cases of—I quote the words from the list —"exceptional hardship". In Committee the Under-Secretary of State constantly referred to "severe hardship", but the list calls it "exceptional hardship". Normal hardship will not do; severe hardship will not do; it must be exceptional hardship.

That exemption is rather baroque, because the DHSS proposes that every case of exceptional hardship must be referred to DHSS head office. It is extraordinary that in cases where there will be the most urgent need for payment, the papers will be sent by post to DHSS head office, where they will join the long queue in the in tray, and there will be considerable delay before a reply is received from an adjudication officer, who will not have seen the claimant, to whom the claimant cannot make representations, and against whose decision the claimant has no right of appeal.

The amendment seeks to lever open the door to further exemptions. It would extend an automatic exemption to 16 and 17-year-olds who would rather study than join the youth training scheme. When the Prime Minister addressed the House in April, before the general election, she gave the range of options available to young people. She said that young people aged between 16 and 18

"can stay on at school, can stay on in further education, can undertake a youth training scheme . . . or they can do a job." —[Official Report, 23 April 1987; Vol. 114, c. 787.]

The amendment seeks to give expression to the clear wishes and intentions of the Prime Minister, by enabling unemployed 16 and 17-year-olds to make a rational and fair choice between joining the youth training scheme and studying part-time. After all, it is a serious choice for them to make, and there may be many reasons why youngsters will wish to study rather than join the YTS.

More than a quarter of YTS trainees go back into unemployment when their courses finish. That factor will weigh with many 16 and 17-year-olds when considering whether to take up their guaranteed places. Half the YTS places train in skills which, in the words of a report issued by the Department of Employment, are not generally in short supply. By comparison, a 16 or 17-year-old entering a course of education, even on a part-time basis, could obtain a qualification which would enable him to continue into higher education. Under the 21-hour rule, he could obtain two A-levels and thereby qualify for a place in further education for which the youth training scheme would not qualify him.

The reasons why a 16 or 17-year-old might debate whether to join the YTS or go into education are strengthened by the passage of arms in Committee, when the Under-Secretary of State was pressed by Labour Members to guarantee a suitable place for every teenager. He will recall that he could not give such a guarantee. He could give a guarantee only that a place would be available, not that it would be suitable for a 16 or 17-year-old. In those circumstances, it is only fair that that youngster should have the right to say, "No, thank you. I do not want a place that I do not regard as suitable for me. I would rather spend my time studying."

The intent of our amendment may not be immediately obvious from its wording and, with some humility, I should say that I am not 102 per cent. confident that it gives expression to our intentions. The clause refers to income support being available to 16 and 17-year-olds. If the amendment were accepted, the clause would refer to "prescribed circumstances and for a prescribed period or when engaged in a course of education or training."

"in prescribed circumstances and for a prescribed period"

The phrase

"when engaged in a course of education" is offered as an alternative only to the "prescribed period", not to the "prescribed circumstances". I accept that it would be impracticable to offer income support to every 16 and 17-year-old. If our amendment were carried it would be limited to the 16 and 17-year-olds who came within the "prescribed circumstances" of the clause.

Who would come within those prescribed circumstances? First, I wish to clarify the doubts about what will happen to the 21-hour rule. At present, about 30,000 16 and 17-year-olds are studying part-time under the 21-hour rule, which enables them to maintain a course of part-time study without jeopardising their supplementary benefit. In Committee the Minister of State said that the income support regulations will, in general, continue the 21-hour rule. It is correct to say that the 21-hour rule will remain available to everyone over the age of 18, just as it is available now. But after the Bill becomes law—if the House is unwise enough to put it on the statute book—that part and all other paragraphs of the regulations will no longer apply to those aged under 18.

Will the Under-Secretary clarify how he proposes to give effect to the statement by the Minister that the 21-hour rule will remain available? Will he also give a clear undertaking that 16 and 17-year-olds carrying out a part-time course of study under the 21-hour rule will be in the prescribed categories, and that their benefits will not be threatened when the Bill is enacted?

There are, of course, other groups who benefit from the present rules, and who appear to be jeopardised by the clause—for instance, teenagers who are separated from their parents, to whom I referred earlier. At present it is possible for such teenagers to obtain supplementary benefit, even for full-time courses of study. They would, however, appear to lose under the clause, unless it is amended along the lines that we propose. There are also school leavers, who at present do not qualify for the 21-hour rule until three months after leaving school. That is an onerous requirement, meaning that many will miss the start of further education college courses in August and September.

It is important to safeguard the interests of those groups and to preserve their right to enter courses of study rather than youth training schemes. If the clause passes on to the statute book unamended, the only group who will automatically qualify for income support while pursuing a course of study will be refugees studying English. While I welcome the exemption of refugees studying English, I see no reason why teenagers who have left school with no literacy skills and without basic English should be denied the opportunity to acquire those skills, which they will certainly need in the future.

The objective of the amendment is to preserve choice and freedom, to give teenagers the right to choose between education and YTS, and to decide for themselves which is the more suitable. In urging the acceptance of the amendment I do not resile from my objections to the principles of the clause, which I outlined at the beginning. I believe that if 16 and 17-year-olds are old enough to be employed, it is wrong in principle that they should be held to be not old enough to receive the benefits of being unemployed. I also believe that it is vindictive to visit this further discrimination on teenagers, who have seen their benefit cut 14 times under the present Government.

Unless the amendment is accepted, we shall vote for it in an attempt to soften the effects of the clause, and also to express our contempt for the clause as a whole.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): It is a privilege for me to take part for the first time in this debate. The freedom of the Back Bencher at last allows me to rove over issues other than the energy issues on which the Minister and I used to spend most of our time.

I do not wish to rehearse the arguments put so effectively by my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) against clause 4 and in favour of the amendment. However, he rightly began by saying that the clause removed a 40-year-old right. Anyone should be squeamish and uneasy about that principle, even if about nothing else.

The clause removes a right to income support in the form of supplementary benefit which has existed for many years. If it were part and parcel of a comprehensive financial arrangement for 16 to 18-year-olds, we could at least have debated that argument. But the anomalies that already exist, and have existed for a considerable time—and for which we all bear some historic collective responsibility—are in no way altered or removed by the changes that the Government now propose.

There is a host of such anomalies in the provisions for 16 to 18-year-olds. My hon. Friend mentioned some of them: the 21-hour rule, the three-month rule, the 12-hour rule and whether a young person is in full-time education. In communities like mine, hon. Members have been grappling with such matters for some time in their Saturday surgeries.

We admit the need for a fundamental change in financial provision for this age group. However, the Government have removed rights without even attempting to deal with that host of anomalies. They propose to replace income support with YTS and MSC schemes: that will be the simple impact of the clause. It is relevant, therefore, to examine the relationship between financial support and the role played by YTS, the MSC and training allowances in the lives of 16 to 18-year-olds, and in the financial provision for them.

I was interested to read the recent publication by the Manpower Services Commission in Wales entitled "Corporate Plan 1987-1991". I recommend that the Minister obtain a copy, as I shall be asking him about some aspects of it in relation to clause 4. Chapter 2 lays down explicit objectives. Under the heading "Implementing the New Training Initiative", it states:

> "The aim of NTI Objective 2 is to move towards a position where all young people enter the labour market with a qualification relevant to employment. By 1991 the Commission would like to see the vast majority of young people in Wales entering the work force with recognised and relevant vocational qualification."

It continues—this is relevant to our argument—

> "To achieve this, there will need to be a comprehensive and coherent provision for all young people under the age of 18 to allow them to choose between continuing in full-time education entering training or a period of work experience combining work-related training and education. The role of YTS and TVEI in achieving this aim will need to be developed in conjunction with other developments."

The key reference is to the MSC's objecti presumably it is also the Government's objective— comprehensive and coherent provision for all y people under 18, to allow them to choose bet continuing in full-time education and embarking on forms of training. I should have thought that there logical correlation between that and comprehensive coherent financial provision for such young peop make the choice, rather than financial provision tha distort the choices that they must make.

In my community it will be very difficult for a pa friend or even Member of Parliament to advise a y person, as I am often asked to do, to engage in full- education in a technical college. In giving such advi would be saying that that young person, and the fa who must support him, will receive not a penny in trai allowance—not £28, not £35—or any other for financial support, other than child benefit of £7 fr and not uprated.

How can an adviser in a community such as n where parents are on very limited incomes, make recommendation for full-time further technical educa As we know, education authorities are unfortunately willing to offer grants. Those entering university or c kinds of college can receive grants from the co education authority, but financial support for yo people entering technical education courses is restricted.

The anomalies, and the distortion of market choi education—let me use the terms that the Minister —are becoming even more absurd as the MSC beco more and more involved in technical education. Ch of Merthyr's technical college are financed by or rel to MSC-supported schemes. In the same institution have people who are supported by the MSC and receive training allowances, and others who are not who receive no allowance. A major financial penal now attached to young people choosing between full- education and training. Choice, however, remains an M objective. That is a matter on which we should press Minister, leaving aside our fundamental objection to clause.

The anomalies in the present system are not restri to 16 to 18-year-olds. Our 19-year-olds are in an worse position. I wrote to the Secretary of State o November about a 19-year-old called Jonathan Guar am disappointed not to have received a reply. I am that such cases have to go to the DHSS, but it seems we cannot get replies in a reasonable time. He goes technical college to undergo full-time education receives no allowance or grant. Moreover, his mum dad have lost child benefit. Is it not time that, instea proposing nasty clauses such as this, we should m comprehensive and coherent training and educa provision for 16 to 18-year-olds?

I should like to investigate how money has b allocated. We learn from the MSC's corporate plan Wales that in 1987-88 £62·5 million was provided 32,000 YTS places. That figure goes up to £68·7 million 1988-89 and to £68·9 million for 1989-90. W assumptions have been made about the number of yo people who will be driven into YTS? The volunt arrangement has worked well in my area. I do not w to get involved in arguments about the problems of Y Young people are being driven into YTS by the finan penalties behind the clause. I should like the Minister to give us some detail about the assessments behind the figures that I have given.

5.15 pm

How will the clause affect the numbers of people who enter schemes in the next two financial years? There must be such figures, because the Government have already prepared projected budgets. We want to know how sensible, worthwhile and suitable YTS places will be.

We have recently heard that the Department of Trade and Industry is to become a department of enterprise. In my community, the MSC is the second or third largest employer after Hoover and another company. It has become an industry of its own. Under the proposed arrangement, I assume that it will become an ever bigger "employer", not least because of the element of compulsion behind clause 4. It is tragic that schemes which work, which we have done much to promote and which have offered opportunities to our young people, are to become compulsory. We are to have conscription rather than choice. Even worse, however, the financial provisions and anomalies which remain are as bad as ever. That will militate against the comprehensive development of our young people's talents.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Clause 4 is a further example of the punitive regime that the Government want us to impose on young people. They go according to the adage of Lord Young, who maintains that young people who do not take a YTS place would rather lie around in bed all day than seek employment.

The clause applies to people who refuse a YTS place —the Minister made a few exemptions in Committee— and others who are not on a YTS course, for whatever reason. It will not matter whether they have been offered a place. The Government are anxious to sacrifice the free choice of youngsters on the altar of the public sector borrowing requirement.

Of the 92,000 16 and 17-year-olds in Britain who are in receipt of benefit, 30,000 benefit from the regulation which allows them to take part-time education which involves up to 12 or 21 hours a week. My hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) mentioned such people's ability to take A-levels. For about 25 years, I lectured to mature students and school leavers in further education. On the basis of six hours' study per subject per week, it was possible to take three A-levels. Many students have achieved high grades and gone on to training colleges and universities. I could name students who achieved second-class honours degrees at universities.

That option is now being stopped. The restriction will not apply to 16 and 17-year-olds whose parents have plenty of cash. It will not apply to the children of Ministers who are sent to the large comprehensive schools of Eton, Harrow and Rugby. They can afford that type of education. But it will probably apply to 20,000 or 30,000 young people annually in part-time education.

It is all very well for the Government to say, as they may say, that it is possible for young people to stay on at school until they are 18 and finish their course in that way, but it was the Minister, the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo), who, referring to the choice of a YTS course, said:

"it is appropriate that careers officers should be guided by the word 'suitable' when choosing a course."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 1 December 1987; c. 311.]

I repeat what I said in Committee: careers officers ar not in their posts simply to be recruiting sergeants fo YTS; they are there to give advice on the basis of the ag ability and aptitude of the young person concerned.

Often careers officers will tell young people in schoo that a YTS course will be available to them, but if the were free to give advice on what would best suit a individual youngster, they would be able to add that might be better to take a course in a college of furthe education. Many careers officers give that advice i schools, because they realise that many children—som would question whether they are children at 16 and 1 —fall foul of a rigid regime in school and develop bette in the freer community of a further education colleg where they can develop their self-reliance and are no subjected to the same discipline as 10 and 11-year-old further down the school system.

Now, however, careers officers must take somethin else into account. They must consider whether funds wil be made available to those young people if they take course in a college of further education. Those funds ma not be available. The Minister may ask why they do no go to the local education committee. However, we al know how the Government have starved local educatio authorities of funds to enable them to award discretionary grants to young people taking O and A-level and othe courses at college.

I cannot say that the Labour Government were all tha they should have been because, as a lecturer, I was sendin letters to—dare I mention the name, Madam Deput Speaker — Shirley Williams at the Department o Education and Science, saying that more funds should b made available to enable young people to study. But one thing that that Labour Government did was to allow the introduction of regulations which permitted young people to study in college for up to 21 hours a week, and many benefited thereby.

There is no doubt that this clause, introduced by the Government, is contrary to the stated philosophy of the Conservative party, which is always talking about freedom of choice. Now the Government are saying that there can be no freedom of choice for those youngsters who refuse a YTS course.

In Committee the Minister promised—I think that he gave a hostage to fortune—that every 16 and 17-year-old school leaver next year would be offered a YTS place. We shall see. I very much doubt it. It must be a YTS place which is suited to the individual. I do not believe that that will happen, because many thousands of young people who have been on YTS courses have discovered that the courses have folded up or been so inadequate and unsuitable — and "suitable" was a word used by the Minister — that they have preferred to leave or been forced to do so. What is wrong with a young person deciding between his YTS course and a college course which he feels may be more suitable? There is nothing in our so-called free society that says that an individual must be employed in a particular job, but that is what will happen to 16 and 17-year-olds. They will be compelled to go on a YTS scheme or support will be withdrawn.

It may be argued that the Government will continue to pay child benefit, but many young people who take a college course do so against the wishes of their parents. Sometimes the parents are separated; sometimes there is friction between them. So the young person who is told by the careers officer that he can enlarge his opportunities and fulfil his potential by taking a college course will now have that possibility jeopardised as a result perhaps not of lack of thought, but certainly lack of appreciation of the position in which many young people find themselves. Ministers ought to ask themselves whether they would be so happy to support this measure if their son or daughter were told that it was a choice between a YTS course and no support whatever.

I support fully what my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston has said. I hope that if this amendment is not carried tonight, it will at least give rise to such a stir among parents and young people that the Government will soon be forced to tell the House that they have had to think again.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): I begin by reiterating what my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) said about our disagreeing with the whole principle of clause 4. As we have no opportunity to debate that, we are doing our best to protect people as much as possible.

Much has been said about ordinary young people who will be severely affected by the proposals in the clause. That is bad enough, but there is another group in respect of which I had the privilege of moving an amendment in Committee. The aim of the amendment was to protect disabled young people who at present are able to enjoy further education — the 16 to 18-year-olds. This was considered necessary, not just by Opposition Members, but by groups which represent the young disabled, by the MSC, by Lord Joseph, as he now is, when he was Secretary of State for Education and Science.

There have been many reports and much information to show why it is necessary that young people who are disabled, either mentally or physically, should have the opportunity for further education, rather than go straight on to YTS. It does not mean that some young disabled people do not automatically go on to YTS schemes — they certainly do — but the young people about whom we are particularly concerned are those who are considered, by others and sometimes by themselves, as not immediately ready at the age of 16 to go on a YTS scheme. Experience shows that some of those who go on such schemes do not necessarily achieve the qualifications or gain the experience that more able young people do, simply because of their disabilities, and so are not given the work experience that they should have. This group of young people therefore need special consideration.

More than once in Committee the Minister gave us certain assurances, to which I shall refer later, because we want to make sure that it goes on record that all people in this category will be able to receive benefit for themselves. No doubt even the MSC is not happy about it, because it is still producing packages for lecturers to deal with disabled people,, called "From Coping to Confidence". It is strange that those packages are still being produced when, under clause 4, the young people will be dissuaded, for financial reasons if nothing else, from attending the courses.

5.30 pm

Many young disabled people who go to college have to make a statement that they are mentally disabled, or whatever. I said in Committee that this was done in the offices of the DHSS, but I have since learnt that that is not so. The young people have to go to their [illegible] practitioners, who, with great respect, may not be t[rained] people to decide whether a mentally or physically d[isabled] person needs this certification or statement, as I t[hink] is called, which is an embarrassment to the young [person]. Many young people will not be prepared to go to th[eir doctor] to ask for a certificate so that they may qualify for [benefit].

Parents do not like to admit that the young peo[ple are] physically or mentally disabled. Colleges are not [happy] about encouraging the system. Under clause 4, th[ey] have to accept a piece of paper stating that the [young] person is physically or mentally disabled. Many [young] people understandably are not prepared to accep[t the] stigma.

One headmaster put it as follows:

"Many of our least able young people cannot co[pe with] the demands of Youth Training Schemes and yet wo[uld be] insulted and humiliated if they were referred to as di[sabled]. The Warnock Report and 1981 Education Act [made] significant developments in ensuring that such young [people] as attended this (special) school were regarded and tre[ated] normal youngsters. Schools like this one have very [much] supported and developed that concept. The labelling o[f them] as disabled totally undermines the work which we hav[e been] carrying out."

The young people themselves have also reject[ed the] labal of severely mentally handicapped. For exam[ple] students at Bedford college have written:

"We all left school and came to college because we [knew] we were not ready for work, or ready to join a YTS [course]. We learn a little bit slower than other young people an[d came] to college to spend a year preparing ourselves for ad[ulthood] and work. We are very annoyed and disgusted to lea[rn that] we will have to register as mentally handicapped if w[e want] any benefits. Why should we be penalised when [we are] improving our education in readiness for work?"

The letter ends by saying:

"Please will you help us in any way you can to furth[er our] case?"

In the last year the strict medical test of severe [mental] handicap has caused grave difficulties and concern. [It has] meant that in some areas there has been a high dro[p out] rate. It has caused financial burdens for families and [has] affected their pride. I have a letter from [the] Warwickshire college of technology and art, where [some] students who joined the vocational induction course [were] "statemented" as requiring special education unde[r the] Education Act 1981. The tutor writes that the requir[ement] has caused 19 of the 53 students to drop out of the c[ourse], that it has caused financial burden to the remaini[ng] students and their families, and that it has also be[en an] insult to the family pride.

In Committee the Under-Secretary of State said t[hat he] saw no problem and that regulation 11*(b)* had w[orked] satisfactorily for some years. That is not the view [of the] National Schizophrenia Fellowship, whose advice w[e] has written:

"This Regulation has not worked well in my opinio[n]. The majority of people who suffer from schizophrenia wi[ll not] accept that they are mentally ill and often have no insigh[t into] the illness, which means of course that they are extr[emely] unlikely to register as mentally disabled. People with m[ental] illness face many obstacles when trying to attend educa[tional] courses, and one more 'rule' may well deter them from [even] applying."

Again in Committee, the Under-Secretary reassur[ed us] that not only the severely disabled but the less se[verely] disabled would continue to be able to claim benefit[s]. severely disabled who are covered by regulation 11*(b)* those who are willing to subject themselves to labelled or "statemented". Will the Minister say that the regulation he will introduce will keep his promise of allowing the less severely disabled to have benefit?

As we have said, all expert opinion is that these young people are not ready for YTS. That is why they have been persuaded to go on training courses or educational courses, even up to the age of 21, before they go into YTS.

Indeed, a recent report commissioned by the MSC from Social and Community Planning Research shows that even now the YTS schemes providing the so-called "premium places", which include a large number of disabled young people, are under considerable pressure. Already 14 per cent. of people on premium places do not get an opportunity of work experience during their two years on YTS, which is a crucial part of making sure that they are ready for employment. A further 31 per cent. can get work experience only in the second year. The report recommends that consideration should be given to expanding the pre-YTS vocational assessment facilities, yet the effect of clause 4 will be virtually to kill off pre-YTS courses in further education.

It is no wonder that not just the Opposition but all the organisations, including the MSC and educationists, who are trying to help young people in this sphere are worried about the implications of clause 4. The Minister must give us more assurances that these young people will be provided for. I refer not just to the severely handicapped, but to those who are less handicapped. The Minister should ensure that the training places will remain open because there is no point putting money into this, backed by the MSC and by the Education Act, if we are making it almost impossible for disabled young people to go on such courses.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I cannot help thinking that the amendment is nothing more and nothing less than a smokescreen. It is not significant that it is the only amendment to be moved by the Opposition to clause 4, one of the key clauses in the Bill? Clause 4 relates precisely to 16 and 17-year-olds. The message in the clause is absolutely clear to young people: if they do not go out and get a job, stay at school or college, or get training on YTS, the community will not spend its money supporting them in idleness. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bill Michie: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot take points of order at the moment.

Mr. Michie: An attendant has just taken out my step-daughter, who was sitting in the Strangers Gallery listening to the debate. Just because she is young does not mean that she is a hooligan.

Mr. Arnold: Despite what we have just heard from the Strangers Gallery, I believe that we have had the smoke-screen amendment to clause 4 precisely because Opposition Members have talked to their constituents during the recess and found that there is widespread support for the concept that young people under 18 who are prepared to be idle should not be supported through the funds that all of us believe should be devoted to various Government services, not least training, hospitals, education, pensions and the like. That is the key.

Let us understand the funds that we are talking ab By not providing those funds to young people who prepared to be idle, the Government will save £84 mill However, if those youngsters, who would otherwis sitting around doing nothing, supported by the taxpa would go on to YTS schemes and do themselves s good by getting trained for the future, the Governm admittedly through a different Ministry, would investing—and I use that word advisedly—£144 mil of taxpayers' money in the future of those youngster

It does not seem intelligent for the Governmen spend £84 million of taxpayers' money to subsidise pe sitting in idleness, when that money, plus an additional million—a total of £144 million—would be investe training for the future of those young people. Tha precisely what clause 4 is about.

Let us look at the amendment tabled by the Opposit I noted with interest that the hon. Member for Living (Mr. Cook) said that he was somewhat confused about effect and intent of the amendment. The purpose of amendment is to extend benefit to young people courses of education or training. We are talking about and 17-year-olds. First and foremost, we must underst what financial support the community is giving youngsters in education—one of the two points in Opposition amendment. The parents of those youngs are already supported through child benefit and inco support for families. If a youngster comes from a brok home and has to fend for himself, he is already suppor under the new legislation by the income support syst Either way, the community is already giving resources youngsters of 16 and 17 who are in education.

What does the amendment propose? The other part the amendment deals with training. If youngsters go i training, they receive YTS training allowances. I susp that the amendment, which effectively means little nothing, is a smokescreen. The key point of clause 4 is t the Government wish to invest in the future of th youngsters, but the Opposition wish to spend money youngsters who are prepared to sit around.

Mr. Robin Cook: The hon. Member for Gravesh (Mr. Arnold) really must be corrected. Oppositi Members tabled an amendment to delete the whole clause 4, and we would be delighted to move th amendment and to debate it. Unfortunately, it was n called. The hon. Gentleman's whole house of cards w erected to show that we have cold feet in regard to t principle of clause 4. It is patent nonsense, like the rest his speech.

Miss Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): I begin responding to some of the points made by the ho Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold). It is important f the House to realise that some of the frustration shown the Opposition in the last two days is because ho Members such as the hon. Member for Gravesham sat Committee for 16 sittings, hour after hour, and sa nothing.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): It is a pity that did not do the same here.

Miss Mowlam: I wish that Conservative Members ha had the common decency and honesty to make tho points in Committee, so that we could have had a prop debate on the Bill and the amendments, But they did n give us that chance.

Mr. Frank Cook: Will my hon. Friend speculate on the wisdom of the old adage that it is better to keep one's mouth shut and be thought an idiot than to open it and prove that without doubt?

5.45 pm

Miss Mowlam: It is important to emphasise to the hon. Member for Gravesham—if he is listening—that some of that frustration was shown in the Strangers Gallery. I do not condone it, but it is important for hon. Members to realise from where that frustration comes.

As regional director for Thomas Cook Ltd. the hon. Member for Gravesham can afford holidays. Young people of 16 to 18 will not be able to do so.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Miss Mowlam: I will not give way. The hon. Gentleman did not give way.

Opposition Members realise the frustration that young people feel when Conservative Members say that they lie in bed all day and make no effort to get work or to join a scheme. The 21-hour rule on part-time education means that people can obtain education. That is what Opposition Members are fighting for in the amendment.

I shall not repeat the many arguments that were put so well by my hon. Friends. I shall begin by reinforcing one point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) at the beginning of the debate about the dishonesty of the Government at the general election on exactly that issue. During the election the Government said that benefit would be denied to young people between 16 and 18 who refused to join a scheme. The Government are now extending that to all 16 to 18-year-olds. We are just beginning to see what the Government have in store for 16 to 18-year-olds. I am worried that this is an indication of things to come, about which Opposition Members as hon. Members and the electorate have not been warned.

In Committee, I asked the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) a number of questions that were not answered satisfactorily. I do not bring them back on Report to score political points, but because 16 to 18-year-olds are concerned about what will happen to them later this year. I should be grateful if the Minister could answer my few questions.

First, I should like to quote his words in response to a question on 1 December 1987 in relation to the number of places that will be needed and the number that will be available. The Minister said:

"all 16 and 17-year-olds will have available to them reasonable training leading to recognised vocational qualifications or credits towards qualifications." [Official Report, Standing Committee E, 1 December 1987; c. 329.]

Unfortunately, I shall remind the Minister about that for months to come when, in different areas in the country, those places are not available. When we asked the Minister how those extra YTS places would materialise, his first response was that there were 120,000 places around the country and that people would in some miraculous way arrive at those places. When we pressed him further, he said that it was not his job to provide the places; that was the Secretary of State for Employment.

I then asked the Secretary of State for Employment the same question, and, in exactly the same way as the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, he began by saying that those places would miraculously that they will be there when the Bill is in Opposition Members look forward to both being true to their words, but in Cleveland, fault of careers officers or the local authorities, short of places for the April school leavers Under the present scheme, after April this young people will be without benefit. They wi in the cold. Will the Minister give us an assur by some unfortunate occurrence, the Govern provide sufficient YTS places, a safety net of be provided without appeal to the Minister o about what should be defined as severe hards

The second question that I should like the answer is how managing agents will be pe provide extra places. Managing agents to wh spoken—I am sure that the Minister has don —are reticent to take on extra people. They stretched to capacity. Many of the managing say, "Yes, we will consider extra places, but we additional funding." Therefore, I should like t to say whether there will be additional fundi to managing agents if they are expected additional YTS plac

I should like to reinforce the point made Friend the Member for Sheffield, Heeley (M who spoke about young people between 16 and not defined, under the conditions given by th as severely disabled. I am not referring to peo mentally or physically handicapped or ment who need to live away from home because th cannot cope, but who are not so handicapp incapable of finding work and who are entitle support under this Bill.

I am concerned about young people who c best be described as vulnerable on academic cri they may have been to special schools or been educationally subnormal. Those people m registered as disabled, but they will have diffic a YTS place. We would like the Minister to g assurance that, if such people make every effo YTS place but are rejected because the mana choose people with some qualifications, they help. The bridging loan is not available to the been assured that that will be available once been on a course. We would like the Minister attention to that group of people.

We would also like the Minister to turn h to another vulnerable group that will be in exi law is implemented; that is, young people wh on a YTS course and taken their bridging allo have eight weeks to go before their 18th birth managing agent will look at that group of yo because for those eight weeks they could not ob training, even by the Government's own cr there be an extension of the bridging allowa the appeal procedure?

I should like to remind the Minister of h relation to the appeal procedure, because he on that point:

"I told the hon. Lady that in those cir extremely unlikely though they were, the person for the Secretary of State's discretion, so that too, has been covered." — [Official Repor Committee E, 1 December 1987; c. 326.]

Therefore, it is up to the Secretary of State; and we want an assurance that the Minister will take into account the position of every young person approaching 18 who cannot get on a scheme.

There is a problem with the list of exemptions from income support. For example, I am concerned with those who have been on probation. Some people will be able to obtain extended benefit if they have been naughty and put on probation while another young person who is not in that category will not. For example, April school leavers will be denied benefit in September—if that is the date given—if they are unable to get on a scheme and no bridging loan will be available to them. If they have been on probation, they will be able to obtain income support. The officials sitting in the Box are nodding at that, so I am sure that the Minister will consider that point.

I should like the Minister to consider when the Bill will reach fruition. Will he paint for me the scenario as it will apply to April school leavers? I understand that child benefit is to be extended to 13 weeks, but when that benefit has finished, and if there is no YTS place, will young 16-year-olds have their benefit stopped on the first Monday in September? That would be a recipe for inequality and disaster. A school leaver may find a place on a scheme for a couple of weeks in the summer and will be able to obtain a bridging loan in September, but other young people will not be so lucky.

I remind the Minister of the many times in Committee when he referred to the importance of an individual's right to choose.

Mr. Rowlands: There is no financial choice.

Miss Mowlam: My hon. Friend is right. Under this Government there is choice only if one has money—and I mean a lot of money. There are many people in and out of work who will never experience choice under this Government. People have to buy their education, buy their health and, under this Bill, those under 18 will have no chance to buy their future.

Mr. Simon Burns (Chelmsford): I have listened to the debate carefully and to the points raised by Opposition Members. I should like to say, without any wish to antagonise or make cheap party points, that in the final analysis their fears will prove to be unfounded.

The idea behind clause 4 arises partly out of misgivings among members of the public, certainly among my constituents, that it is too easy in certain circumstances to slide straight from education on to supplementary benefit. Of course, no rational person will claim that there are a large number of young people who are workshy or who cannot be bothered to find a job. That is nonsense and it is not true. I think that everyone in the Chamber today would agree with that. However, having said that, the duty of the Government, I am proud to say, is to train young people so that they have a skill and are able to meet the sharp end of the competitive job market.

Clause 4 does not provide only one option, and that should not be forgotten. The clause provides three options for 16 and 17-year-olds. First, it allows young people to remain at school full time; secondly, they can go into full-time employment; thirdly, they can find a YTS place. What is even better is that under this Bill the Government guarantee a YTS place for all young people who choose that option.

The question at the heart of the amendment is finances. I believe that the fears of Opposition M will be unfounded because I do not believe that the situation will change and make it harder for young If young people stay in full-time education, their will continue to receive child benefit. If those qualify for income support, they will receive it. In and unfortunate situation of the child not living or her parents any more due to a problem at hom 17-year-olds will qualify for income support in th right.

One has to bear in mind the philosophy behin the Government are doing for young people. We ensure that educational standards for those at sch improved and that technical and vocational educ given to those who will best benefit from it, becau they will be on their way to acquiring skills. Tho choose the youth training scheme will now rece years of invaluable work training and experience constituency, there is a good record of YTS traini Marconi is one of the major employers in Chel It is an excellent employer and takes on a fair nu YTS trainees. It has a record of over 80 pe translation from YTS to full-time employment w company.

Miss Mowlam: If the three options that th Gentleman outlined are so wonderful and the YT excellent, why is it necessary to make it an enforced to make it compulsory? If it is so great, let us leave j

Mr. Burns: I fail to understand the hon. Lady' about the YTS being compulsory. It is not. As th Lady said in her intervention, there are three choi

For the small minority of people who do no w work and who want just to collect state benefit, a de will be created because they will no longer be able so. That is a perfectly reasonable response b Government for people of that age group. I do not that it should be encouraged for anyone of any age to be workshy and to live off the state. I do not w go down the road of making wild accusations abou numbers of people being workshy, but when it co 16 and 17-year-olds, every encouragement should be to make sure that they do not just languish on th queue.

Mr. Robin Cook: The hon. Gentleman is maki of the more lucid speeches in favour of the clause have heard. I am grateful for his insight, that the why he believes that the Government should act prevent from obtaining benefit those who choose unemployed and not to take training. Why is the necessary? Why is it not sufficient to rely on the arrangements that are already available to the DH prevent benefit going precisely to those whom the Gentleman identifies as the problem, those who r voluntarily unemployed who do not qualify for ben present?

Mr. Burns: I think that the hon. Gentlem forgetting that the Bill deals not only with that s situation. It also gives a guaranteed place for 1 17-year-olds on YTS if they choose that option.

If the Labour party decides to divide the House amendment, I shall wholeheartedly support

[Mr. Burns]

Government because I believe that the clause is relevant to the economic situation. It upgrades, gives statutory confirmation to and improves the work training and experience of those who want to go on YTS. It also makes sure that we minimise the number of people who abuse and will continue to abuse the state benefit system. For those reasons, I shall support my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Lobby.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): Watching the progress of the Bill through Committee has been a useful experience for many hon. Members on both sides of the House who were elected to the House last year. Today we shall reach Third Reading, and we shall look back on the Bill as a most fascinating and interesting experience for us all.

As has often been said by Opposition Members, few speeches were made——

Miss Mowlam: None.

Mr. Greenway: There were some. Few speeches were made by Conservative Members, but that does not mean that we do not take our responsibilities seriously and do not investigate the matters that we are addressing.

A clear difference of philosphy and principle has emerged. It came to a head during the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold), when there was an unfortunate interruption. One wonders what sort of indoctrination the young people who made that unruly demonstration have been subjected to so that they should consider the opportunity being offered by the Government of a training place leading to qualification to be slave labour.

Ms. Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): The hon. Gentleman clearly learned nothing during the Committee stage. The frustration that was shown in the Chamber today was the frustration of people who have a direct experience of the results of the Government's policies, unlike Conservative Members, who have not. The frustration was the result of the appalling comments by the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold), who demonstrated a total lack of understanding of the current position. I hope that the hon. Gentleman's speech will not follow that line.

Mr. Greenway: I do not believe that there is any lack of understanding. The understanding is clear. It has been the Government's policy progressively over the past eight years to improve training opportunities for young people on a scale seen in no other country in Europe that has enabled the Government to introduce the clauses.

I remind Opposition Members that the matter was focused upon during the general election campaign last year, and proved widely popular.

Miss Mowlam: The hon. Gentleman cannot have listened either in Committee or in the Chamber. Both my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) and myself have said that the Conservative party was not honest during the election. In the manifesto—if the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) is doubtful, I shall produce it for him—all that the Conservative party said was that those who said that they did not want to go on a YTS course would be denied benefit. The legislation widens that across the board to all 16 Therefore, the Conservatives did not pr dare?—a genuine choice to the electorate.

Mr. Greenway: My right hon. Friend State made the manifesto pledge and th position abundantly clear in his speech on on 2 November, when he said:

"We included the proposal in our electio we would guarantee a place on YTS for ev under the age of 18 not going directly into the manifesto that we would take ste entitlement benefit from young people under remain unemployed."—[Official Report, 2 Vol. 121, c. 656.]

That is clear, and it is the thrust behind t

The YTS has received Government s than £1 billion per year. Rather than Oppo criticising the Government and, as my h member for Gravesham said, through t trying to put up a smokescreen rather t debate on the clause, I feel that we should c Government on the policy that they ha training young people.

It does not stop with YTS. My hon. Fri for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) referred to t technical and vocational education initiati be successful. It has been so successful t referred to in at least 50 per cent. of the le received from secondary school head governors who are concerned about the fut in the light of the Government's propos national curriculum.

Many arguments about the clause forward during the debate and in Committ want to go over old ground, but there matters that have not been addressed should like to refer.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, We Wareing) posed the question about how feel if his child were offered the choice b unemployment and no benefit. As a father children who are all at a local comprehe have to say that, if that were the choice children, I should have no hesitation in en went on a YTS course. Let me tell the h why.

On that course, they would be exposed experience — they would be exposed to work. They would be exposed to the wo training — and what is wrong with tha infinitely preferable to embarking upon a and a lifetime of drawing such benefit. Su right that we give every young person betw 16 and 18 every encouragement. I be intervention we witnessed in the Strangers' the speech of my hon. Friend the Member demonstrated that some young people indoctrinated that they would prefer a life and support.

There are two reasons why it is right, a the Government should introduce this there are now more opportunities for youn on at school. As a parent I would prefer make that choice. Indeed, my eldest son, wh that. I feel sure that, increasingly, more par that the best way forward is for their chil at school. The rolls at our schools are falling, so much so that the Government have been able to introduce the open enrolment provision in the Education Reform Bill. I hope that the opportunity to stay on at school will be grasped by more and more young people—the availability of benefit should not act as an encouragement to leave school.

Secondly, it is right to introduce this measure because, over the past 18 months, we have witnessed an unprecedented reduction in unemployment and the revival of our economy. The revival in the fortunes of Britain lead me to believe that there will never be a better chance for any Government to say to the young people, "Please, please consider your future and make sure that training represents the way forward for you instead of a lifetime of benefit."

During the election campaign I knocked on the door of a house and a young gentleman, rather scruffily clothed, opened it. He said that he could not support my party because he was out of work and on the dole. I replied, "Come on now. There are plenty of jobs in this area. Why do you not go to work at the bacon factory that has vacancy signs outside?" The young man said that he did not want to work at that factory. That is yet more evidence of the type of indoctrination that we have witnessed tonight.

Unemployment should not be an option for any young person under the age of 18. It need not be and it will not be when the Bill is passed.

Mr. Portillo: We have had an interesting debate. It began with the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) saying that his objective was to preserve choice. I find that rather confusing because that is also our objective.

Other things that the hon. Gentleman said confused me further. He said, for example, that the amendment was intended to lever open slightly further the exemptions contained in the clause. However, his amendment, as drafted, extends entitlement to income support to all people engaged in a course of education and training. That would represent a massive increase in the role of income support; and, for what it is worth, it would cost £1 billion. I became more confused when the hon. Gentleman said that that was not what was intended and that his objective was more limited. I do not intend to nitpick about that.

The hon. Gentleman alternated between talking about part-time and full-time education. That led me to believe that we have not made clear to him what will be available to young people and what the changes will mean. I shall try to concentrate on that in my reply.

I shall try to respond to as many of the points that were made during the debate as I can, but I must tell the hon. Lady the Member for Redcar (Miss Mowlam) that I am not confident that I will be able to answer all her questions. She came at me like a good-humoured Gatling gun, with a whole series of questions. If I leave any of them unanswered, I shall certainly pursue them with her on another occasion.

A number of my hon. Friends have already made it clear that three options are available to young people: work, education and YTS. The only option that will be denied as a result of the clause is the dead-end option of unemployment. To be specific, the only option that is denied is unemployment, with the state picking up the tab.

We are offering young people YTS. The place schemes are available and valuable and th organisations are of high quality.

6.15 pm

From 1 April 1988 anyone who is offering a must be an approved training organisation. T will be awarded to organisations only after inquiries about the competence of the relevant quality of the training, their financial stand commitment to health and safety and the ed opportunities available. Furthermore, training will be enforced by the training standards adviso which will periodically inspect all YTS placeme

The hon. Member for Liverpool, West De Wareing) repeated a question that had been Committee about the suitability of YTS places our intention to force a young person on to a sc is unsuitable. The guidance given to careers offic Department of Employment categorically stat suitable place is one that accords with the car agreed between a young person and the careers which enhances the job prospects of the youn There can be no doubt that YTS enhances job and it appears to be the first choice for ma people. It is apparent that 60 per cent. of those o into a job straight after it. We expect that perc increase in the years ahead.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and (Mr. Rowlands) wanted to know what the incre numbers of YTS would be. I must emphasise to Gentleman that what is on offer is entirely volun that young people can choose between educati —if one is available to them—and YTS. It is for us to estimate how many more people will YTS.

One probable result of the clause will be th people will stay on in education. It is also prob more people will go into jobs—YTS is not option. We estimate that, in Great Britain—I to the hon. Gentleman, but I do not have the Welsh —up to 30,000 additional young people will j for a full year as a result of the benefit cha addition, we expect that most of the 50,000 trai currently leave YTS early to become unemployed on to complete their courses. I hope that that info helps the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about costs, cautious about telling him about them because w know what the additional demand will be. At the we anticipate that we will spend more on YTS tha save on benefit. Therefore, this is not a co measure.

Mr. Rowlands: I have pressed for a detailed because in communities such as mine and some represented by Conservative Members there is an heavy dependence upon the MSC and YTS. communities that I represent there will be no between taking a job and YTS. Those com already depend on YTS, and further dependence n to a diminution in the value and character schemes. That is why numbers are so important.

Mr. Portillo: I hope that the hon. Gentle reassured by our guarantee of the quality placements as a result of the new ATO status t affect all bodies after April. I hope that he will agree that it is better for youngsters to be dependent upon YTS than on benefit. That is the basic proposition that we are offering to the House today.

The hon. Member for Livingston wanted to know why teenagers who are estranged from their family, possibly because they have been battered at home or are at risk of abuse, should not live permanently on income support. I do not see why they should. If they are establishing themselves independently away from home, I do not see why, once they have been given the chance to find a job or once they make a decision to stay in education or to take a place on YTS—in other words, once they have been given the period of months which we call the child benefit extension period—they should not be as self-supporting as any other independent person.

Indeed, it is financially to their advantage to accept a place on YTS because it will offer them £28·50 a week in the first year and £35 in the second year. If that is not enough for them to live on because, for example, they are supporting a whole household or have children and the demands of their family take them above the income support level, they qualify for income support over and above their training allowance. If they have housing needs, they qualify for housing benefit. I hope that I have reassured the hon. Gentleman on that because perhaps we did not explain it previously as fully as we might have done.

Equally, the hon. Gentleman asked about pregnant girls training up to 11 weeks before the anticipated date of confinement. I do not see why there should be any distinction between what we can expect of somebody in training and what we can expect of somebody in work. It is typical for women to work up to 11 weeks before the date of confinement, but if they are suffering exceptional sickness and it is certified by a doctor, that would qualify them.

Perhaps I can now answer a question asked by the hon. Member for Redcar about young people who are on bail or probation or under social work supervision being treated more favourably. That is not right. I ask her to recognise that because somebody is on bail or probation or under social work supervision it does not mean that he is guilty. It does not bear that inference. Such people are required to be away from home and provision must be made for them until the end of the child benefit extension period. In that sense they are in a similar position to others for whom we are providing income support during that extension period—for example, those who need to live apart from their parents.

Obviously education has been a crucial matter in the debate, because the amendment invites us to consider it. Some speeches displayed considerable confusion. Those who are continuing in full-time non-advanced further education—"further" simply meaning beyond the age of 16—will be able to qualify for income support broadly in the following three categories. First, if they are in an income support household, their parents will be compensated at the appropriate rate for a youngster over the age of 16, which is £19·40 under income support and the same as the youngster would receive if living independently.

The second category is those who are estranged from their parents for good reason. If those people choose to stay in education, either at school to d

(Mr. Greenway) spoke clearly and forcefully on this. The general public are genuinely worried for unemployed young people, and that is why they demand that the Goverament offer those young people something better. We are doing that. We are offering young people a job, YTS or full-time education. Only one option is being abolished, and that is unemployment at the taxpayers' expense.

Mr. Robin Cook: The Minister concluded by saying that he had consulted the British public and that it had voted for this clause. With the greatest respect, the British public did not vote for any such thing. The British public, in so far as it has been construed to have voted for this Government, voted for a manifesto which said that the Government would take steps to ensure that those under 18 who deliberately chose to remain unemployed would not be eligible for benefit. In its wisdom or otherwise, the country voted for that.

But that is not what clause 4 achieves. It removes the right to benefit of all 16 and 17-year-olds, whether or not they choose unemployment and whether or not they have been offered a place on YTS. The clause will remove the right to benefit for many 17-year-olds who may well have chosen the option described by the hon. Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), of obtaining a job on leaving school and holding it for a year or a year and a half, only to find themselves redundant, without choosing to be made redundant or wishing to be unemployed. Under this clause they are not entitled to a penny in income support or unemployment benefit. With respect to the Minister, that is not the proposition that his party offered the British electorate in June.

I found the debate entertaining, if only for the gloss put on this point by the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who explained that there was no deception in the manifesto commitment, because the Secretary of State for Employment had clearly explained what it meant in a debate in the House in November, five months after polling day. That is a new gloss on electoral commitments that I shall treasure for the future.

6.30 pm

The debate has also been interesting for one omission that I want to draw to the attention of hon. Members on both sides. We have been debating this important clause —possibly the most important in the Bill—for nearly two hours with no intervention from the Liberal or Social Democratic parties — indeed, without being favoured with the presence of a single representative of either party. That is to be regretted; I was hoping that the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) would be present and would take part. I can understand why he may feel a certain diffidence about being here today, because yesterday he made a speech in the House in support of my new clause to index child benefit in which he said:

"I maintain that we must retain the true value of child benefit."—[Official Report, 12 January 1988; Vol. 125, c. 195.]

He then woke up this morning and read in the newspaper that, on the same day, his leader had committed himself to a 6,000-word document that included a commitment to means-test child benefit.

I consulted last night's Division list and I regret to say that the leader of the Liberal party was not present to vote; if he had been, he would no doubt have voted with the rest of the members of his party in favour of indexing child benefit before means-testing it. I am sorry Member for Southport does not feel able to tonight, but I can understand his diffi absence, the rest of us must make up our mi can on the principle of the measure.

The Minister's concluding remarks conf view that we are right to oppose the princip In my opening speech, one of the most imp on which I elaborated and for which I pres would happen to the 21-hour rule. Mr. Portillo: I beg to move Amendment No. 11, in page 4, leave out line 34 and insert 'subsection (4A) above is to apply to the person to whom the direction relates'.

With this amendment it may be for the convenience of the House to discuss amendments Nos. 12, 13 and 38.

Mr. Speaker: So be it.

Mr. Portillo: Amendments Nos. 11, 12 and 13 have been framed by the Government mainly in order to clarify intentions relating to the power, in certain circumstances, to recover income support paid to a 16 or 17-year-old as a result of the Secretary of State's direction regarding severe hardship, and to clarify also the respective functions of the Secretary of State and the adjudication officer regarding such matters. Amendment No. 11 corrects a drafting error.

Amendment No. 12, which amplifies the existing subsection (4E), is designed to make it clear that recovery under section 20 of the Social Security Act 1986 should be broadly in line with recovery under section 53 of that Act.

Amendment No. 13 is designed to clarify the different functions of the Secretary of State who revokes his direction in relation to entitlement to income support on account of severe hardship, and the adjudication officer's role in deciding that an overpayment is recoverable.

Amendment No. 38 amends section 53 of the Act to make it clear that in such cases recovery of income support under that section applies only to parts of section 53 that are relevant.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 12, in page 5, line 18, at end insert

'(4EA) Section 53(2) and (5) to (9) below apply to income support recoverable under subsection (4E) above as they apply to income support recoverable under section 53(1) below.

(4EB) The other provisions of section 53 below do not apply to income support recoverable under subsection (4E) above.'.

No. 13, in page 5, leave out lines 28 to 37 and insert—

'(4G) Where a direction under this section is revoked, the Secretary of State may certify whether there has been misrepresentation of a material fact or failure to disclose a material fact.

(4GA) If he certifies that there has been such misrepresentation or failure to disclose, he may also certify—

(a) who made the misrepresentation or failed to make the disclosure; and

(b) whether or not a payment of income support has been made in consequence of the misrepresentation or failure.

(4GB) If he certifies that a payment has been made, he may certify the period during which income support would not have been paid but for the misrepresentation or failure to disclose.

(4GC) A certificate under this section shall be conclusive for the purposes of this section as to any matter certified.'

Clause 5

CONTRIBUTION CONDITIONS FOR SHORT-TERM BENEFITS

6.45 pm

Mrs. Beckett: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 6, line 27, at end insert—

'(2A) For the purpose of determining entitlement to unemployment benefit, contributions credited in the last two years before the beginning of the relevant benefit year by virtue of the receipt of invalid care allowance shall be treated as if they had been paid.'

Clause 5 tightens the conditions entitling someone to draw unemployment benefit should he be unfortunate enough to lose his unemployment. In that context, the amendment draws attention to the position of carers. Most hon. Members will know that in recent months the Government have given themselves their usual generous meed of self-praise for their generosity in accepting the ruling of the European Court and extending the entitlement of invalid care allowance. Opposition Members welcome that. We are only sorry that the Government did not feel able to do it earlier than they were compelled to. Let us give credit where credit is due: the Government gave entitlement to the invalid care allowance.

The Minister will be aware, and hon. Members may have become aware in recent months, that for many who are entitled to invalid care allowance there is little financial difference if the person for whom they are caring is already drawing a dependant's addition to an invalidity benefit on their behalf. Groups such as the National Council for Carers and their Elderly Dependants have emphasised that it is still beneficial for married women who have become entitled to invalid care allowances, to which they were not entitled in the past, to claim that allowance because it gives them an entitlement to credits towards their national insurance contributions and a further entitlement to benefits as of right. It is partly a matter of independence, and therefore it is to be commended on those grounds, even to those who did not derive any financial benefit from the award of the invalid care allowance, although some did derive financial benefit.

At the time the addition was made, when the Government were telling us how good they were being, I doubt whether many people realised that within a short period the Government would tighten the conditions for contributions that would entitle people to unemployment and sickness benefits in a way that would particularly hit carers. The national council has drawn attention to its concern about this and has pointed out that when a dependent person dies carers are in a particularly vulnerable state. It is exactly at that time that they are likely most to need their entitlement to unemployment or sickness benefit, when they are struggling to cope with what is bound to be a substantial readjustment to their lives, because invalid care allowances are paid only to people who are fully committed to caring. The association says:

"such a move would be entirely opposed to the Government's expressed commitment to recognising the needs of informal carers and to supporting them. We see it as a most retrograde step."

The example has been given of someone who might have looked after an elderly and severely disabled relative, perhaps for 10 years, and by the time the relative dies the carer is in her middle years, in her forties or fifties, and is not likely to find it easy to get a job straight away, even if she wished to do so. Under the Bill such a person will be refused the right of unemployment benefit because she will not have been able to work over the past few years and will have not paid, rather than been credited with, contributions.

This is unfortunate because, quite apart from contradicting many of the things that the Government have said about carers and their commitment to them, it contradicts the origin of the award of invalid care allowance. The "Law of Social Security", the 1982 edition, refers to the way in which invalid care allowance should be paid, and to its origin. It points out that a household in which someone who is severely disabled needs attention may suffer financial hardship, not only because of the needs of the invalid, but because of the sacrifices made by other members of the household to look after the invalid. A study carried out by Sainsbury in 1970 showed that two thirds of disabled people needing care received it from a relative, and this very often interfered with the relative's earning capacity.

Apart from the fact that it is socially just to compensate people who are prepared to take that step, it makes a good deal of economic sense. If a person is able to live in the community, cared for by a relative, the state saves a substantial amount of money. If such a person needs hospital care, or must go into a home, the cost to the community is considerable. It was estimated that 11,500 people were in receipt of supplementary benefit mainly because they had left employment to care for an elderly or disabled relative.

The issue about which the Government were so pleased with themselves—the award of invalid care allowance to married women — confirms that, although we might deplore the discrimination involved in the assumption, it was intended for people who had given up paid work to become unpaid carers. The crude assumption made in excluding married women from the benefit, which was introduced basically for reasons of economy, was that married women tended not to be in the employment market. I hope that all hon. Members will deplore such reasoning today, but it confirms that the basis of the invalid care allowance is to compensate or assist people who have given up paid work to do something of great value to society and to those for whom they care.

In Committee, the Under-Secretary said:

"Of course it is recognised that people have left paid employment to care for a relative or friend. That is why they receive invalid care allowance in the first place. It is an income maintenance benefit that is paid specifically and precisely because it is recognised that people are giving up employment to perform this valuable task."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 3 December 1987; c. 412.]

In order to qualify for invalid care allowance the person must not only spend at least 35 hours a week as a carer, but must not be gainfully employed. There is a tough earnings rule to supplement that. One can earn only £12 a week while receiving invalid care allowance, and that limit has been unchanged since 1982. It is clear that invalid care allowance is designed for people who give up paid work to undertake the unpaid but very demanding task of caring for someone who is severely disabled. They are not allowed even to continue in part-time employment to maintain their toehold in the employment market. By definition, they are full-time carers.

The Government are now saying, in particular to women — because as carers women are the greatest number affected by the clause—who may have worked full time throughout their adult lives, first in paid employment and then in unpaid employment as carers, that they cannot claim unemployment benefit because their contributions record shows that they are not really in the labour market. That is insulting and is totally unrelated to the position. Not only is a carer working, but, by the Minister's definition, a carer who is claiming invalid care allowance is working full time in the role of caring. It is hard to think of another occupation in which one must work full time to qualify for unemployment benefit.

The proposed amendment is not a concession to carers. It is simply an act of justice and logic. I compare the position of two carers, one who is part time and paid, and the other who is full time and receiving only invalid care allowance. They could be doing identical work, apart from the hours involved, but if their work as carers comes to an end and they have to look for other work, the paid carer, who is not working full time in the occupation, may be able to claim unemployment benefit. The unpaid carer, whose contribution to society and the person for whom she is caring is substantially more, may not be entitled, if the Bill goes through, to unemployment or sickness benefit. We are addressing ourselves particularly to unemployment benefit in the amendment, because we believe that that is the more unjust of the two deprivations, precisely because of the relationship between invalid care allowance and paid work.

We asked the Minister about the numbers who would be affected. As I recall, he suggested that about 20,000 people now lose invalid care allowance entitlement each year, and approximately 11,000 of them might be able to claim unemployment benefit. That suggests that vast sums of money are not involved. However, a very important principle is involved and it is a principle which, in other circumstances, the Government have upheld.

Mrs. Audrey Wise (Preston): I want briefly to reinforce the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) on the fact that these people —mainly women—are actually working and making a contribution to the economy.

In Committee on 3 December 1987 the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security referred to caring as a "valuable task" at column 412. The House should focus on the word "valuable". The task performed by the carer is valuable for the person being cared for, but it is also a direct contribution to the economy. The carer is contributing to the economy just as much as someone in paid employment because, if she did not undertake caring, the person for whom she was caring would become a cost to the state.

It has been calculated, quite conservatively, that the value to the economy of the carers amounts to about £6 billion per annum. That is the contribution that carers are making to all of us and to the taxpayer. However, they are now to be deprived of a very small benefit entitlement—not a concession, an entitlement—that the Opposition never felt would be a matter for party division.

It is deplorable, foolish and short-sighted of the Government to take this attitude. Carers perform a valuable service and they are paying a heavy cost. When they are able to re-enter the labour market, usually when they are bereaved and not at their best, they at present have a small cushion because they can claim unemployment benefit. They often find it difficult to obtain work precisely because they have been out of the paid employment market for a number of years. They have not been divorced from the economy; they simply have not been receiving wages for the work that they have carried out. They have suffered while their peers possibly have received promotion, added to their experience and so provided themselves with fresh skills to attract potential employers if they need to change jobs. The carer has fallen behind in that competition.

However, in the face of that, the Government are seeking now, when they tell us daily that the economy is in splendid shape, to tell carers, "Never mind the fact that you have made this valuable contribution and are a valuable part of our social fabric. We will strip you of this entitlement." When we asked in Committee what a carer should do if that happened, the Minister said that if a carer were entitled, he or she could claim income support. The Government are driving carers back to a means-tested benefit, thus taking away from them money and, as many carers would believe, their dignity as people who have made a solid economic contribution to the country.

I have given up hoping that the Government will step back from these deplorable steps, but I hope that we will receive the maximum possible support for the amendment. The amendment provides no improvement for people; it simply seeks to maintain the status quo against those who wish to deprive carers of the potential entitlement of claiming unemployment benefit when they are again able to seek work, if that day ever comes. I commend the amendment to the House and hope that hon. Members will vote for it.

Mr. Portillo: I want to begin by addressing a point made by the hon. Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) at the end of her remarks. The hon. Lady made a point about the dignity, or indignity, of claiming benefits, and she made the same point in Committee. I do not know why she appears to be pushing the idea that it is not dignified to claim benefits to which one is entitled. I thought that that was a proposition that she occasionally accused Conservative Members of peddling. Of course, it is not true to say that we peddle that proposition. For her to say that there is any stigma or indignity for people without other resources to claim state benefits to which they are entitled is an extraordinary assertion.

Mrs. Wise: The indignity lies in the fact that there is an encroachment on the privacy of the person concerned. There is no indignity in making the claim, but people who claim supplementary benefit—or income support, as it will be—feel in a different position vis-a-vis the state. They are compelled to show their total financial position, and they see that as an indignity. They want a benefit that operates as if they had continued to make contributions. That is a simple matter.

Mr. Portillo: Very well; we agree that there is no indignity as such in applying for those benefits. We also agree that people who cease to qualify for invalid care allowance will be entitled to income support if they have no other means. That enables me to reject any suggestion that the Government do not recognise the position of carers. We recognise their position three times over. First, we recognise their position, because ICA is available during the time that people are caring and it is an income support benefit. Secondly, we recognise their position because during the time that they receive ICA they continue to receive credits for the long-term benefits. That should not be underestimated because it gives credits towards entitlement for retirement pension, widow's pension, sickness benefit and invalidity benefit. I remind the House that retirement pension can be awarded on the basis of a single year's paid contribution, and the rest of the entitlement can be made up of credits. Thirdly, we recognise their position because if someone coming off

[Mr. Portillo]

ICA finds himself or herself unable to claim unemployment benefit and without resources, income support is available.

I will consider the amendment now and explain to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) that the amendment goes much further than she intended because it would enable all those who have received ICA to draw unemployment benefit without having paid any national insurance contributions at any time. I suspect that the hon. Lady wanted to revert to the present position with regard to ICA. Certainly the amendment would run contrary to our intentions.

We have argued that unemployment benefit is intended to provide a measure of compensation for people who normally work for an employer when they experience short periods of unemployment. I have thought carefully about the clause and this provision. I do not believe that one can say that someone who has been caring for a relative or another person for a number of years is in a position analogous to someone who has recently been in employment and dependent upon the income from that employment for maintenance.

The position is different. Our new contribution conditions are intended to reinforce the link between paid employment and payment of national insurance contributions. In doing so, we intend to establish equity in the treatment of all potential claimants. I raised that problem in Committee with the hon. Members for Derby, South and for Preston. Matters of equity arise if, in the case of ICA, we say that credits should count as paid contributions.

I wish to add to my comments in Committee, because I have been anxious to understand the practical consequences of the clause. I wish to put to the House and, in particular, to the hon. Members for Derby, South and for Preston, some practical examples of what the clause means. In each case, I have considered somebody who might give up work in November 1988 to go and care for somebody. After a period, that person may cease to care—in the sad event, for example, of the death of the person for whom they have been caring—and seek to return to employment. In each case, I am assuming that the person has a full record of contributions until November 1988. If that person wished to return to employment in 1989 and were seeking a job, there would be no difficulty in his claiming unemployment benefit, because the contribution record depends on the tax years 1986-87 and 1987-88, both of which are prior to the start of the ICA award.

If the person was away caring for two years from November 1988, he would cease to draw ICA from November 1990 and seek to claim unemployment benefit. Again, the claim would depend on the tax years 1987-88 and 1988-89. Unemployment benefit would be payable because the person was working for the whole of 1987-88 and would have paid the necessary contributions in that year and would have ICA credit after that period.

If a person gave up work in November 1988 and was caring for three years, he or she would cease to draw ICA in November 1991 and try to claim unemployment benefit. The claim would depend on the contribution record in 1988-89 and 1989-90. In that case, the person would have been working between April 1988 and November 1988 and so would have paid contributions on 25 times the lower earnings level during that period. Again, the clai unemployment benefit would succeed, based on tho contributions at the lower earnings level and on the credits for the balance of the year and in 1989-90.

As I do not wish to mislead anybody, I admit th I took my example for another year, the clai unemployment benefit would fail. However, I have sh that it is still possible for someone out of employmen caring for a period of up to three years to qualif unemployment benefit. The average length of awa ICA is between 18 and 28 months, depending o period that we consider. It varies a little from time to The average, therefore tends to be quite a short perio course, some people care for very long periods, equally, if the average is between 18 and 28 months, people receive ICA for only a very short period.

Long-term carers will not be able to claim unem ment benefit if they exceed the period in the example I have quoted, but those people have not depe recently on income from employment. They have d ICA for a considerable period, but they are not negle and, if they have to be supported by the state, in support is available to them.

I hope that I have helped to put the measure perspective and explained why I have concluded reluctantly, I cannot accept the amendment or ev different version which would single out ICA claiman that credits would be treated as if they were contributions.

Mrs. Beckett: I wish to respond briefly to two p raised by the Minister. First, he believes that the Bil reinforce the link between paid work and unemploy benefit. He does not wish to single out those who re ICA in respect of their treatment regarding credits, b he has acknowledged, ICA is a replacement for paid w He has introduced a new definition into the approac ICA—that it is not a replacement for paid work, b replacement for paid work which has recently been Presumably, therefore, there is a period during which considered that ICA is a replacement for paid work after that, it becomes an end in itself.

Secondly, the Minister sought to press the case th does not matter that the Government are doing because only very few people will lose and the majority of carers are entitled to ICA only for an ave of 18 months to 28 months. His examples supporte argument, although he conceded that they would not supported him so favourably if he had chosen a diff year. He argues that very few people will be affected that most people will not find themselves in a diff position. If that is so, there is no harm in protecting t few people who, in many cases, left paid work befor Minister redefined ICA as a replacement for paid w He admitted that the cost to the Government of impro this disadvantageous clause would be extremely sligh has therefore encouraged me to press our amendme

UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT AND OCCUPATIONAL

7.30 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I be amendment No. 16, in line 37, after '55', insert
'and in subsection (1) after "55" there shall be i words "and has retired from regular employment

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker):
we shall take amendment No. 17, in page 6, line insert—

'(c) in subsection (1), after "55" there shall be i words "other than a person who has retire police service, the fire service, or any other occupation at the normal retirement ag occupation".'.

Mrs. Beckett: The amendments raise the is deprivation that will be suffered by those wh draw occupational pension at the age of 55 as the offset of that occupational pension ag entitlement to unemployment benefit.

Clearly, all those who take early retirement voluntarily or under a degree of pressure affected. One of the amendments deals with t group of people who may be in a position occupational pensions and may, indeed, be f that position. The second deals with specific gr public service—the police and fire services. M people may be liable, as part of contractual u ings and conditions of employment, to retire a

Hon. Members will no doubt recall that provision now exists for the offsetting of oc pensions over the value of £35 a wee may also be aware that, whether we agree with that provision is part of a slightly different p benefit provisions. Those over 60, as matters n can if need be draw the long-term rate of supp benefit. They do not have to sign on as being av work: they are not subject to the same degree o in that regard as younger people.

Whatever we think of that provision, there some recognition that the Government were ar if someone was drawing part or all of his oc pension he was acknowledging that he had ret have taken some steps towards recognising th their decision by treating that person in the sam some respects, as others who have retired and a the age of compulsory retirement. Howev compensating arguments do not apply if the occupational pension against unemployment be apply from the age of 55, as is proposed in the

The provision is in many ways inconsistent w that the Government have taken in the past. Th may recall that my hon. Friend the Member for South-East (Mr. Nellist) reminded us in Comm those forced into, or voluntarily taking, early or redundancy were, by specific guidance and from the Government, ruled not to have made t voluntarily unemployed, so that they were not for taking an action that might be helpful to so whole — for example, where large-scale red were threatened — although they would s

penalty of abatement of their pension against unemployment benefit. That provision also will not apply to those who are placed in such a position at 55.

That seems to imply that the Government have been saying to those over 60 who are in such a position that they are in effect retired. Now, in the Bill, the Government are telling people over 55 that if they are out of the employment market, and if, because of the level of their income, they begin to draw their occupational pension, they, too, are in effect retired.

In debating various aspects of the Bill, we have seen that the DHSS and the Department of Employment do not seem to be wholly in touch with each other. I suppose that it is just possible that it has not been in the forefront of the consciousness of Ministers at the DHSS that the Employment Gazette for May 1987 showed that, in 1986, although 53·4 per cent. of men aged 60 to 64 were economically active, 80·3 per cent. of men aged 55 to 59 were economically active. That presumably means not only that the vast majority of those aged 55 to 59 are fortunate enough to be economically active, but that it is much less likely that men of those years would regard themselves as retired.

As has been argued this evening in a different context, a variety of tests are available to the Government if they feel that someone is drawing benefit and is not really available for work, or seeking it. Not only are those tests available in law, but both the tests and their interpretation have been significantly tightened in recent years. It is not the case that there is no recourse open to the Government to deal with an individual who is judged with good cause to have been retired from the age of 55. However, the Government are saying that everyone over 55 who begins to draw occupational pension has retired.

People who find themselves in that position already face a financial penalty. There is the faint possibility—I believe that the Minister referred to it in Committee—that some people in fairly senior positions are fortunate enough to work for companies that are prepared to make special provision for them if they retire at 55. They may have been pushed out in the wake of some takeover, for instance. Such companies may be prepared to ensure that, although such employees take their pensions early, they do not suffer a financial penalty for so doing.

However, the vast majority of those who find themselves in that position at the age of 55 will receive no compensation from their employers for having to take an actuarially reduced pension. They are already facing a penalty, and, at 55, they are facing a greater loss than someone who is in the same position at 60. Adding insult to the injury of having to lose out on pension entitlement, the Government have decided that, because those people are drawing pension, they must not be entitled to unemployment benefit.

Many people in employment who find themselves in such circumstances will be pushed out of the labour market by the present economic climate. Their local community, and perhaps even their trade union representatives, may have encouraged them to take redundancy or early retirement if their employer requires a large number of redundancies, rather than putting younger men or women in that position. The case was cited to us of members of the Institution of Professional Civil Servants in the Devonport dockyard who may find themselves forced out of the labour market in the comparatively near future.

A young man of 26 or so, forced to take retirem might receive only about 10 months' worth compensation, and would therefore be in no positio keep his wife and family in reasonable circumstance with anything like the income that they had previo enjoyed. The IPCS, like many others in its circumsta — including employers — is encouraging its members to take retirement. Although they will s some penalty in the form of actuarial reduction of be they will be in rather better circumstances than younger people involved.

The IPCS and various others who have written t have pointed out that, because of the actuarial reduc in itself, and also because not many pension scheme as good as those of the police and fire services—I deal with public service schemes in a moment—pe may begin to draw occupational pensions not because consider that they have retired or wish to have retired, because their income would otherwise be so low that would suffer substantial difficulties. They take the gam of the actuarial reduction, and go for the short-term of drawing occupational pension rather earlier. It se entirely wrong that people in those circumstances sho lose their right to unemployment benefit, for which may have contributed for 40 years. The Government proposing to remove that right suddenly.

The Minister may have an answer to my next quest tonight—he did not in Committee. Do the Governm intend to compel these people to be covered by the res scheme and to take part in interviews during which t are questioned about their availability for work? Department of Employment is as concerned about s people as the DHSS.

The specific case concerns the police and fire servi The vast majority of people in those services are expec to retire by 55. The Minister said in Committee that peo know that when they enter those occupations. That is tr but it is equally true that, when they take up their job, t know that they pay heavy pension contributions into th occupational pension scheme while making natio insurance contributions like the rest of us. In return those contributions, they know that they will rece entitlement to an occupational pension from the age of because that is the age at which society has decided th ought to consider retiring because of the nature of th occupation. It is in society's interests that they take ea retirement. Such people will also have the expectation th they will be entitled to unemployment benefit should th need it when they have left their initial employment.

It is ridiculous for the Minister to suggest that peo in the police and fire services know the conditions of th contract. Their contract is not yet being breached. Th remain forced to retire at 55 and entitled to draw pensio for which they have contributed heavily during th working lives. The contract with the state, however, being breached in that their contributions towar unemployment benefit will no longer entitle them to th benefit should they begin to draw more than £35 occupational pension. Moreover, that sum has not be increased for many years, so it represents a much small pension than when the provision was introduce Furthermore, the provision was introduced for peop aged 60 or more.

[Mrs. Beckett]

We have found it hard to understand why the Government have picked on the age of 55. The Minister was able to assist us in Committee. He gave us the reason with admirable clarity. He said:

"it was an arbitrary line to take a step in the direction of concentrating help that was available."

Perhaps even more interesting, he said:

"I acknowledge that it has not gone the whole way". —[Official Report Standing Committee E; 8 December 1987, c. 456.]

I am not sure what that means. I suspect that it means that the Government thought that they might get away with choosing the age of 55. They may even have considered that at no age should people be entitled to draw unemployment benefit should they unfortunately have to draw against their occupational pension. Perhaps the Minister will tell us what he has in mind. There is no doubt, however, that 55 has been chosen arbitrarily. It is none the better for that.

7.45 pm

It was made plain to the Committee that policemen or fire fighters who accept their contract of employment, pay their contributions and retire, draw on their occupational pension and are fortunate enough now to be in work, but who lose their job after January 1989, may well lose their entitlement to unemployment benefit although they have continued to contribute to the national insurance scheme to pay for that entitlement.

There is no doubt that, if the Bill becomes law, people who retire from the police or fire services and become unemployed, usually involuntarily, will not be entitled to unemployment benefit for which they have paid, although they will be required, should they get employment, to make contributions which will not entitle them to a further penny of benefit. That is plainly ridiculous and unjust.

Although the Minister has leaned heavily on pension circumstances and the generosity of the scheme, I must remind him that the heavy contributions that have been made to pay for occupational pension benefits have been taken into account, as have the advantages of early retirement, in salary negotiations and negotiations on conditions.

I should like to demonstrate how strangely the Government are behaving. They tell us consistently—it is the Prime Minister's favourite exhortation — that people should save and take responsibility for themselves in retirement. We are told that we should not rely on the state. People who have gone into occupational pension schemes have done exactly what the Prime Minister has instructed, but such provision for retirement in early years is offset against unemployment benefit entitlement. If, however, people have not chosen, or have been forced into, an occupational pension scheme but have income from investments, they may well receive £35 a week or substantially more. That sum will be quite irrelevant to entitlement to unemployment benefit as long as national insurance contributions have been paid. Only investment by way of an occupational pension scheme, which is compulsory for people in the fire and police services, leads to this denial of rights.

The Minister did not make any case for this decision in Committee. He merely said that it was a means of saving more money. Off the top of my head, I recall that it was £65 million in a full year. That sum will be saved at the expense of 27,000 to 30,000 people who wi their full or partial entitlement to unemplo That is quite unjustifiable, and it is why we t to give the House an opportunity to reject provisions.

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): courtesy and honour, which the House wo me, I must declare that, for the past eight been privileged to represent the 90,000 m National Association of Retired Police parliamentary adviser.

Amendment No. 17 attracts my attention We should consider the effect of clause 6 o of the community—retired police officers. suitably qualified people to take up a caree service. They give dedicated service to the pu at the age of 55, in certain cases, depending regulation they are made redundant. It is n it is the wish of Parliament by regulation t their occupation.

How does that affect constituencies? Aft of dedicated service as police officers thes themselves made redundant at 55. I kno redundant" is an emotive expression, pensioned off and have no further useful ser the constabulary. I can say with confidence a retired police officer in every constituenc and Wales, so, when we debate this clause, e one of us is debating something that constituents.

The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs right to explain that these men and wome heavy price for the pensions that they event receive. In August 1982, when the House wa statutory instrument and without d contributions were increased: the pension co male police officers went up to 11 per cent., female officers went up to 7 per cent. There and no consultation. Hon. Members can re that serving police officers at that tim look receiving their pension but also felt that if t opportunity on retirement to obtain other w the safeguard of receiving benefit under the legislation. Many officers serving at that time full and certain hope that if they found diffic through the social security legislation, wou give benefit to them.

In addition, they had made a formal a enhance their pensions, particularly in respe section of pensioners, police preserved-rate particular submission went before a com police negotiating board and was fully negot agreement was reached on 25 February 198 settlement—it may surprise hon. Members in relation to pensions — was £1·41. I staggered and disappointed beyond words wh Secretary refused to accept that negotiated pensioners. As a result of parliamentary transpired that it was the first occasion in hi negotiated settlement on pensions had been c my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State Department.

We now place a further burden on the me who have served us so well for many years force. It is against that background tha amendment justified. It is full of knowledge and common sense. In a spirit of honesty, which I hope the House will always expect of me, I must say that I find great difficulty in going into the Government Lobby tonight on this amendment. I take no pleasure in this but I am placed in this position by the clause as it stands. That is why I am delighted to see amendment 17. However, it is with sadness that I take this stand.

But that is not enough. At this late stage of debate on the Bill I plead with the Minister, with all the sincerity that I can muster on behalf of more than 90,000 police pensioners, to pay heed to this amendment and the submissions of hon. Members and to say that he will review this matter with as much charity — no, not charity, because these people do not want charity, they want justice, and I happen to believe that their case is just. They retired, knowing what the rules were, and now, having retired, they find that the regulations will be changed by a decision of the House tonight—a decision which will affect every one of them. Worse than that, it will affect those police officers who are finding difficulty in getting employment. Therefore, I have a moral decision to take tonight: I must support retired police officers and others who also have public service occupational pensions. I ask yet again that the Minister will pay heed to this for the benefit of people who are really in need. I ask that he should be as considerate as I know he can be.

The Minister for Social Security and the Disabled (Mr. Nicholas Scott): Both these amendments seek to exempt certain groups of people from the effect of the abatement provisions. The first amendment raises the general principle, and the second moves to specific groups, particularly police officers and firemen who retire at the normal retirement age for their occupation, and seeks to remove them from this provision.

I understand what is involved and, if I were in any danger of forgetting, it has been reinforced by the eloquent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn), with his usual fairness and conviction, putting forward the case that we heard in Committee, particularly on behalf of police officers and the retired members of that profession with whose interests he is concerned. I know that there are strong opinions about this, and it has been borne in upon me in representations that I have had from the Police Federation, from hon. Members and most recently from my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West. We are discussing here both the general point and that particular one, and I seek to address both of them.

On the general point, as we reminded ourselves in Committee, the idea of abatement of unemployment benefit against occupational pension is not new. It was first mooted by the National Insurance Advisory Committee in 1968. We knew that the then Labour Government produced regulations which would have provided for abatement from the age of 58, but were dissuaded from pursuing that course at the time. Early in their life, this Government provided for abatement from the age of 60. I well understand the point made by the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) that there is a difference between 60 and 55, for the reasons that she set out in her speech.

In a sense, I do not rest my case on the principle that the hon. Lady enunciated. The principle that the House should bear in mind when it decides on the general is that the intention of unemployment benefit is to p a measure of income replacement because unforeseen and unexpected contingency of unemplo for those normally reliant upon earnings from em ment. We have to ask whether it should be a principle that people who know that they will reti certain age, who have made provision for it, perh enhanced contributions, and who have completed a with an occupational pension available to them, then have the opportunity to avail themselv unemployment benefit that is within the na insurance scheme precisely for the purpose of pro protection against that unforeseeable and unex contingency of unemployment. That is the principle which I rest my belief that we are right to intr abatement from age 55.

I acknowledge that the expectations of police o and firemen will be changed by the introduction clause. That is why we have given plenty of notice proposal. Nobody will be affected before January Hopefully, it will be possible for people so to arrang affairs as to minimise the effect of the change.

I return to the point that firemen, police officer others in this position know from the outset that the be required to retire at age 55. They know that they been paying an enhanced contribution towards pension to make that possible. They know that at th they will have a generous pension. Particularly in the of police officers, the training and experience that have acquired in their profession will make them fitted than many people of that age for other employ

The pattern of the police service is that policemen to join the force at the age of 18 or 19. If they serv the 30 years that would give them maximum pe entitlement of two thirds of their final salary, they w retire at age 48 or 49 and could still claim unemploy benefit for the year for which they would be entitled Anyone who joined the police service up to the age and who served for 30 years would still be able to ge maximum pension entitlement, leave the service and unemployment benefit for 12 months.

My hon. Friend asked me to give fresh consider to the matter. I have done so for a variety of rea because of the representations made by the P Federation, because of points put to me in Committee, because of my own background, being the son of a p officer and having spent quite a few years in Nort Ireland in close contact with the Royal U Constabulary. I promised in Committee that I w reflect further on the position of the police and of ot in a similar situation, and I have done that.

I fully understand the case that is made. If those pe have not actually been compelled to pay the contributi it has been part of their conditions of service that should pay contributions to a pension scheme during whole of their service, and that they should pay nati insurance contributions into the national insurance f Some may be compulsorily retired at age 55. Following proposed change, their benefit will be liable for abatem We are talking here about policemen and fire figh Such arguments could be put forward on behalf of o groups. The armed forces spring immediately to min

I said I would reconsider the point. I also made it p in Committee that I saw real difficulties about maki special case for certain occupational groups. I know it will disappoint my hon. Friend in particular, in view of the case that he put forward this evening, but I have to tell the House that, having weighed the arguments carefully, I do not believe that it would be wise to exempt policemen and firemen from the overall provisions of the scheme.

It might be worth my while pointing out to the House how the abatement scheme will work. Unemployment benefit is reduced by 10p for every 10p after which an occupational pension exceeds £35. That means that unemployment benefit will be extinguished only when a substantial pension is paid. In the case of a married man who receives the higher rate of unemployment benefit to take account of his wife, benefit will not be lost entirely until his occupational pension is £85·90 a week or more. A single man will continue to receive benefit unless his occupational pension is £66·50 a week or more.

I reiterate that the proposed change is to reduce the age at which the provision takes effect, from 60 to 55. I believe that it can be justified in part by the changing pattern of retirement. More and more people are retiring at 55. Indeed, some are retiring earlier. What is more, we are not only reflecting that pattern, but the move from 60 to 55 is in tune with the Government's determination to seek to concentrate the finite resources that are available — increased resources may become available — within the social security system more sharply on those areas where help is needed. I do not believe that those who can retire at age 55 with substantial occupational pensions would fit into that category.

On the general principle, I rest on the point that those who retire at age 55 are not confronted with the unforeseen impact of unemployment. To exempt particular occupational groups, however strong their case may be, would not be a wise decision for the House. I therefore advise the House to reject the amendment.

Mrs. Beckett: We would be happy to pick up the Minister's last point and to see no group affected by the provisions of the clause, but we feel that the Government's case is weaker in some respects than others. Obviously it is the job of an Opposition to probe the weaknesses. The Minister has made a couple of remarks which should be taken up and placed on record in the context of the debate.

The Minister referred to the generosity of the pensions. The hon. Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn) commented on the level of contributions. It has been suggested to me, and we mentioned this in Committee, that in many cases a person will draw at best a half-rate pension plus a lump sum, which may mean that, for financial reasons, that person will want, and will indeed need, to seek employment.

Mr. Scott: The pension funds for the particular groups about which we are talking provide for pensions of two thirds of final salary. There is an option to take some of that pension out as a capital sum, with very generous treatment of that capital sum by the Inland Revenue. That is an option, but most of the schemes about which we are talking will provide for a pension of two thirds of final salary after 30 years' service.

Mrs. Beckett: I do not have the papers with me, but I believe that that point was made in the context of the fire service. It may well be something to do with the pattern of employment. That observation was made in Committee and it was not queried there. I am not co that, but, when I had the papers with m had some substance.

People are not drawing sums of mon necessarily comfortable or easy to live. Th true because of the age level that we are It could be argued—this is why the Government backed down on proposals as far as the present ones—that it is mo the age of 60 family commitments will However, at the age of 55 many p dependent children, particularly those yo fit the Government's definition of depe under 25 and unfortunate enough to be receive lower rates of benefits. If they are subject to the range of provisions that we which means that the Government expect remain dependent on their parents at a sub age than many hon. Members would con At the age of 55 many people may well h need their help and support.

The Minister said that, because the pr come into effect until January 1989, the G given plenty of notice that there will be did not recognise the point that was mad and again tonight, that people who have may have been fortunate enough to find e that they may lose that employment aft caught by the provision. How on earth expected to provide for a change that possibly have expected? I suspect that, if Member had suggested to them that Government would do such a thing, th rejected such a suggestion with outrage. in which retired people or those on the bri can adjust to cope with the effects of the

In a sense, the Government are making own back. They have said, reiterated a argument, that people who leave the fire at the age of 5[illegible] have retired and mus occupational pensions for full support. T do not expect them to seek employment. T of that is that the Government are saying that those people receive in their retirement that they should not need to seek em Minister's right hon. Friend the Home Se thank him for that information.

Mr. Scott: Someone who is about to re be entitled to draw upemployment benefi 1989. That would be virtually the whole of for unemployment benefit, which runs for

Mrs. Beckett: The Minister is right, bu point that I was making. Someone on retirement now who obtains employment, January 1989, will be affected by the clau be in a position to make any adju circumstances or to his arrangements. Th are saying to such people, "You have retire your occupational pension scheme, altho paid contributions, to be generous. We co is enough for you and that you will not employment. We do not expect you to employment or need it." I suspect that consequences for the negotiations that will on pay and conditions in the police and fire services. It is right that there should be such consequences, because the Government are reneging on one side of a deal.

Whether they work in the police or fire service, or in other occupations, people find themselves, through circumstances almost invariably beyond their control, forced into early retirement. Most men or women over 55 are still available for work, and looking for work. The clause is wholly misconceived. It is particularly misconceived in the case of people with patterns of employment such as those in the police and fire services.

Although I should have liked to press both amendments to a Division, to save the time of the House I shall withdraw amendment No. 16, but I shall formally move amendment No. 17 and press it to a Division.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 17, in page 6, line 39, at end insert—

'(c) in subsection (1), after "55" there shall be inserted the words "other than a person who has retired from the police service, the fire service, or any other prescribed occupation at the normal retirement age for that occupation".'.—[Mrs. Beckett.]

Apart from that, a substantial number of low-income families would be entitled to family credit on income grounds, but not even the Government expect them to claim it or it to be awarded to them. The best estimate that the Government have offered—it is based more on hope than on evidence—is that about 60 per cent. of the families entitled to family credit on income grounds will draw it. That still leaves, even on their assumptions, which are not shared by most of those who have studied the matter, some 40 per cent. of low income families who, because they will not draw family credit, for whatever reason, will not receive even the element of compensation that the Government have included, and will simply face the loss of the benefit.

It has been suggested to the Opposition that at present some 7,000 pregnant women and some 77,000 children are entitled to and receive welfare milk without being on supplementary benefit or family income supplement. Those are some of the people who will lose if the Government use the enabling power, as it has been suggested that they will. We move the amendment to ensure that such low-income families retain that entitlement.

8.30 pm

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) is right in most of what she says about the Government's intention to end the low-income scheme, but she has not presented the case as fully as she might have done. I should like to set out how we see the arrangements working in future.

For those on income support there is, of course, no change from the present situation. They will qualify for free milk and vitamins in the future in the same way as they do now. I should like to make one point perfectly clear in case there is any doubt about it. An expectant mother who lives in an income support household will qualify for welfare foods during her pregnancy, because the assessment of the household allows for welfare food to be given to a pregnant girl or any pregnant woman in the household irrespective of whether she is the main claimant or the main claimant's daughter. That point caused some concern in Committee, and I wanted to make it clear.

Another point that came up in Committee related to young girls under 16 who might be in local authority care. I should like to point out to the House, particularly to those who served on the Committee, that section 21 of the Child Care Act 1980 imposes a duty on local authorities to ensure that children in care are provided with accommodation and that they are well maintained. The duty on a local authority can best be summed up by saying that it is expected to act as a good parent towards the children in its care.

The hon. Member for Derby, South drew attention to the position of expectant mothers and family credit. With regard to family credit in general, the amount of money that is being built into family credit for welfare foods is £2·55. That sum has been calculated on the basis of what school meals cost over the year. With regard to children who are under school age, the sum is considerably more generous than the sum that the family will need to find to provide the milk, which we estimate to cost £1·82. The £2·55 that the family receives in family c to replace the free milk and vitamins, adequately.

It is true that a pregnant woman wil qualify for family credit if it is her first after all, that derives from the nature Family credit is a benefit for families wi proposal that family credit should be as monthly basis means that there will be adjustments to take account of any new family. Extra sums of £2·55 will be paya those extra babies as they arrive. I emphas that we see the proposal leading to many m fewer, people being helped.

The hon. Member for Derby, South about the take-up of family income su concerned about that, too; but I emphasi up of the low-income scheme has been m the take-up of family income supplem running at about 7 per cent. I reiterate t estimate that only about 6,800 expectant w entitlement of free milk under the low-inco think that most of them are women who a the first time; and most will probably hav recently and are likely now to be eligib statutory maternity pay. They will be outs the scheme based on low income.

We believe that the cash provision that go to many more children than currently foods. About 124,000 children are prese through family income supplement to fr further 77,000 receive free supplies under scheme, whereas we estimate that 300,000 the age of five in family credit families £2·55. The new arrangements will help a more children. As I emphasised, the take- income scheme has been low and disappoi

For all those reasons, while I recogni group of women will not be eligible for w they have been under the low-income schem to be able to tell the House that a much la children will benefit in future. The va expectant mothers who are on low income to be looked after under income support, a so whether the woman is the main claiman support household, or perhaps the claimant. In either case, the woman will be foods during the period of her pregnancy when the child is born.

Mrs. Beckett: I have listened with care what the Minister said. I wonder why it al be impossible for the Government to say tha a little more in family credit to 300,000 ch deciding that as a consequence they have benefit from some other people who are eq and in low-income families. I note that th not contest the figures that we gave—the 7 women and about 76,000 to 77,000 children families who are now likely to lose their welfare foods. No reason has been given f necessary. It is simply suggested that, bec number of pregnant women or children may extent, that makes it all right.

The Minister did not answer my point abo woman in a family where family credit is where compensation might be paid for the loss of welfare foods for the children in the family but not for the loss of welfare foods for the pregnant mother.

The Minister referred to the low take-up of the scheme and said that it was all right to abolish it, as the take-up of family credit will be higher. I should be more impressed by that argument if I did not recall that, not in the Bill but as part of the pattern of changes of which this is one, the Government are making sure that low-income families in a different context will not be entitled to free school meals any more. Some 250,000 children are losing by that, although the take-up of that scheme is substantially higher than the take-up of family credit. The Government are on fairly weak ground in that element of change.

I am aware of the fact that we are under substantial pressure of time. For that reason, and for that reason only, I do not advise my hon. Friends to vote on the amendment, but I hope very much that what has been said in the House and in Committee will be noted in another place and that a little more time will be available for noble Lords to discuss the issue.

Therefore, with considerable reluctance, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Portillo: I beg to move amendment No. 43, in page 12, line 41, at end insert

'and sections 29, 33 and 53 of the Social Security Act 1986'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider Government amendment No. 44.

Mr. Portillo: The effect of amendment No. 43 is to commence the amendments to sections 29, 33 and 53 of the Social Security Act 1986 which are to be made by schedule 4 to the Bill.

Amendment No. 44 has three effects. It provides for payments from the social fund in Northern Ireland and recoverable overpayments of housing benefit and other social security benefits made in Northern Ireland to be recovered by the Secretary of State from prescribed benefits in Great Britain. In the case of the social fund payments, that power is also extended to enable the Secretary of State to recover an award for a partner of the recipient and from a liable relative. The principal reason for making the power retrospective to 6 April 1987 is to apply it to amounts recovered since that date in respect to overpayments arising in Northern Ireland.

The need for the amendment arose in order to prescribe for the recovery of social fund loans made in this country when the applicant moves to Northern Ireland. The existing powers in section 33 of the 1986 Act were inadequate for the purpose, and that obviously gave rise to some doubt about the powers contained in sections 29 and 53 which provide for the recovery of housing benefit and social security overpayments. That is the reason for the proposed amendments.

Mrs. Beckett: I do not propose to detain the House, b I am sure that the Minister would be disappointed if, some stage, we did not take the opportunity to point o that one of the reasons why we have the Bill is that t Government are still correcting the legislation.

When we consider the amendments that t Government are now seeking to move, it is clear that th are substantial and I believe I am right in saying that th were tabled as late as Monday of this week. That shou go on record so that when the Minister explains to us th of course they understand what the law is doing, that th have got the wording right and that we are mistaken in o observations to suggest otherwise, that can be placed context.

Amendment agreed to.

The Social Fund

Mr. Robin Cook: I beg to move amendment No. 23, i page 17, line 15, after 'meet', insert

'the cost of community care, exceptional needs or'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient t take the following amendments: No. 24, in page 17, lin 17, at end insert

No. 28, in page 17, line 20, after 'allocate', inse 'prescribed'.

Mr. Cook: During the Conservative party conferenc I was greatly encouraged to read reports in the press tha when the current Secretary of State for Health and Socia Security took office, he did his best to rid himself of th albatross of the social fund. Unfortunately, he could n persuade other Cabinet Ministers to let him off the hook That demonstrates that anyone who comes to this issu with a fresh mind is bound rapidly to come to th conclusion — as the Secretary of State did — that th social fund is a lunatic inheritance from his predecesso and that, in the interests of social security claimants, i should be ditched.

Unfortunately, the Secretary of State was unsuccessfu in his attempts to rid himself of the social fund, and we fin ourselves debating another batch of Governmen amendments to the social fund, which remains the mos objectionable feature — among many — of the Socia Security Act 1986. The main result of the social fund is t replace the present system of single payments to claimant with a system of loans that will be repaid by deduction from benefits. Those benefits are calculated and approve by Parliament to provide for a subsistence level of income However, after such deductions, claimants will be left t survive on income that, by definition, will be belo subsistence level.

The previous Secretary of State—granted the presen Secretary of State has not made an attempt yet — described the new arrangement as a banking facility for social security claimants. It will certainly resemble some banks because I understand that, in those social security offices where special rooms will be set aside for social fund interviews, floor to ceiling security screens are being installed to protect the staff from the claimants' frustrations as they try to wrestle with the ins and outs of the social fund.

In the next fortnight the House will have the opportunity to debate the social fund as a result of the three orders that will be before the House. In the meantime, we wish to propose two amendments to the Bill that would remove two of the gravest defects of the proposed social fund. Amendment No. 23 would curb some of the limitless discretion available to the Secretary of State under present legislation. The amendment achieves that by subjecting the grants for community care and the loans for exceptional needs to the same regime of prescription that the schedule provides for cold weather payments.

8.45 pm

It is worth pausing to note that, although we refer to the structure as a single social fund, it is rapidly splitting into two separate funds. On the one hand, there will be a fund out of which payments will be made for maternity grants, funeral grants and severe weather payments. Those payments will be made as of legal right and as an entitlement to the claimant. On the other hand, the payments for the community care grant and exceptional needs loans will be paid at the discretion of the social fund officer.

There are other contrasts that should concern Parliament. The former fund will be regulated by parliamentary instrument, whereas the latter will be controlled simply by guidance issued by the Secretary of State. There will be no parliamentary scrutiny of that guidance. As yet, we have had no opportunity to debate the social fund guidance manual.

From the claimant's point of view, there are even more stark contrasts. Payments out of the first fund for maternity grant, funeral grant and severe weather payments are subject to appeal. They are paid as a legal right, so there are grounds for appeal. The claimant may pursue that appeal through the DHSS, through the tribunals, through the commissioners and through the Court of Appeal if he feels aggrieved. However, the claimant who is refused the exceptional needs loan has no right of appeal. The decision made in the room on the other side of the security screen is final and there is no opportunity for redress. No wonder it is felt that it would be safer to announce that final decision from behind the safety of a metal grille. Our amendment would put both funds on the same footing so that we would have one genuine, integrated social fund.

I wish to deal with another area of sharp contrast that leads me to the other amendment. Perhaps the greatest contrast of all between the two funds is that the claimant seeking a maternity grant, funeral grant or severe weather payment must be paid if he or she can establish a legal right. However, the claimant who turns up looking for a community grant or an exceptional needs loan need not be paid. Indeed, that claimant can be paid only if the money has not run out. He or she is applying for a payment from a cash-limited fund and the limits on that fund may well have run out by the time of application.

We understand that the DHSS, with prudence and perhaps forethought, has prepared a computer programme for distribution to DHSS officers to control their allocations from the fund. Unfortunately, when I last heard, the software was not up and running. Understandably, DHSS officers are worried about what they will do with their computers on 1 April without the software. Perhaps the Under-Secretary will consider that problem.

Assuming that the process of monthly budgeting works, it will mean that, in week one or week two, those who claim in those weeks might succeed in getting a payment if they manage to get on the right side of the social fund officer on the other side of the grille. However, if they turn up in week three they are liable to be told that the month's budget is getting dangerously low and that they are being refused. It will not be that they are not entitled or that they do not come within the scope of the guidance manual, but that the money just is not there.

We know how things work regarding public expenditure, and it may be that when the same claimant goes back in week four he may encounter a different attitude. The social fund officer may be anxious to meet his month norm and to dispose of his monthly budget, so it is possible that he would be more generous than he was a week before. I predict that, rapidly, all round Britain, welfare officers and social work departments will learn what is the best day of the month on which to send a claimant along to apply for a loan from a social fund.

This is bizarre. But what makes that rather outrageous procedure not entertaining, but deeply tragic, is that we now have the figures for what the cash limits will be. The most dramatic development since Second Reading in terms of the social fund is that we now have deposited in the Library what the allocation will be to every local DHSS office. We now know the figures, and they are horrendous. As many hon. Members will know, I have done some work on allocating to constituencies not just the allocation for the social fund expenditure next year, but the actual expenditure on single payments by the same office in 1986-87. Therefore, we can compare what was available to claimants on an outturn basis for last year with what will be available for the same purpose through the social fund next year. The results are alarming.

When we first saw the figures, the biggest cut was allocated to Glasgow, Provan, which was to receive only 22 per cent. of its total expenditure in 1986-87. I understand that that cut was so enormous that the Government have withdrawn those figures and announced that there was an error in the calculation, which they will amend. For the sake of Provan I am glad that that step has been taken, but it leaves me in a particularly invidious position because the DHSS office which now enjoys the unfortunate distinction of having the biggest cut is Bathgate in West Lothian, which serves my constituency. In 1986-87 it spent £2,250,000 on single payments; for 1988-89 its allocation under the social fund is £750,000 —one third of last year's expenditure.

I shall pursue the constituency point to which this gives rise elsewhere and content myself on this occasion by noting only that West Lothian is one of the half dozen travel-to-work areas in central Scotland with the highest rate of male unemployment and that my constituency, including as it does a young new town, is one of the half dozen constituencies in Scotland with the largest number of single parents. There is no conceivable index of poverty, deprivation and social need by which one could single out Bathgate and Livingston for the largest cut in payment to social security claimants anywhere in Britain. Why us?

We are comforted, in so far as it is possible to find consolation in these circumstances, by the fact that we are almost not alone. We have ranked all the local offices by the size of cut and we find that there are just over 20 local offices facing a cut in expenditure which brings them down to half the level of spending of 1986-87. Those 20 local offices read like a roll-call of the areas of greatest deprivation and poverty in Britain. Let me share with the House the names of some those local offices.

First comes Bathgate and then Bloomsbury — the local office in central London which deals with most of the bed-and-breakfast cases of the homeless who are camped in Camden and one of the areas of most intense pressure on the DHSS system. The third area, for some curious reason, is the New Forest. It sticks out like a sore thumb, and I cannot explain why it has found its way on to the list of multiple deprivation. My only possible explanation is that it may be well known in the DHSS that the spokesman for the official Opposition spends every summer on holiday in the New Forest, and I am sorry if I have visited my blight on the local residents.

Fourth is Cowdenbeath, which covers central Fife—an area with one of the highest unemployment levels in Scotland, and that is saying something. Then comes Leeds, north, Leven—which covers the rest of central Fife—Glasgow, Cranstonhill, Dundee east, Kilmarnock, the Oval—the other central London office with the largest pressure on it — Thames south, Glasgow Anniesland, Glasgow Maryhill, Leeds south, Chester-le-Street, Abertillery, Edinburgh east, Sunderland south and Middlesbrough. All those offices are having their expenditure cut by half.

One can compare and contrast that list of the areas of multiple deprivation with the 20-odd local offices which do best out of the allocation. There are just over 20 which manage to receive over 80 per cent. of last year's expenditure. These are the local offices that face the smallest cuts and in half a dozen cases an actual increase over last year's expenditure. Where are they? They are Eastbourne, Folkestone, Lewes—Lewes receives 80 per cent. of last year's expenditure, whereas all the others receive more—Worthing, Guildford—that well-known black spot of unemployment — Bournemouth, Weymouth, Ipswich, Hove, Skegness and Epsom. I cannot conceive of what index of social deprivation would qualify Epsom as being one of the areas for the highest allocation for any social security budget.

The list continues with the Isle of Wight, Thanet, Exeter and—now we come to it—the local office in the whole of Britain which receives the best allocation of all from the social fund and which is singled out for the most favourable treatment and the most generous allocation —Bognor Regis. Next year Bognor Regis will get two thirds more for expenditure than it spent last year, while Bathgate will receive two thirds less. Bognor Regis is in the Arundel division. I do not know what level of mul deprivation may be found in Arundel, but it has a 19 Conservative majority. I checked it in the list ran constituencies by unemployment and discovered tha was almost 500th. Why Bognor Regis?

I observe that the Under-Secretary of State has rele two pages which explain how the calculation was don enable the allocation to be carried out. I note from calculations that six sevenths of the formula relate to historic spending pattern, but one seventh relates to w the Department expects to happen over the coming y Whether that means that the Department expects m factory closures in Bognor Regis, I do not know. should be told. I find it impossible to reconcile th figures with either the previous spending pattern of th local offices or any objective measure of social nee Bognor Regis and Bathgate.

So far I have dealt gently with the Government. I h compared the expenditure on single payments last y with the total allocation of the social fund to those of for next year. But it would be possible to make a m accurate and restricted comparison. The single paym that were paid out in 1986-87 were grants and were repayable. Most payments out of the social fund wil loans. Indeed, of the £200 million budget, £140 million be loans and only £60 million will be grants. That £ million of loans is not new money; it will come out of pockets of the claimants who will have to repay it.

It is therefore possible to sharpen the contrast and that it is really between the expenditure on single paym last year and the allocation for grants from the social f for next year. Let us take some of our major cities examine what happens if we make that comparison.

Birmingham contains the constituency with the high unemployment in Britain—that of the deputy leade the Labour party, my right hon. Friend the Member Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). Last yea received £12·5 million for expenditure on single payme Next year, it will receive barely £2 million in gra through the social fund—a reduction to 17 per cent the previous level of expenditure. That is a comparison. It means that £10 million is being taken of Birmingham's local economy, which is a loss

I notice that my hon. Friend the Member for Bris South (Ms. Primarolo) is present. She will be interested know that last year Bristol received £2·75 million in sin payments. Next year, it will be allocated barely £500,(in expenditure grants—a reduction to 19 per cent. of previous year's expenditure. I notice that my hon. Fri the Member for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. McAvoy) i his place. Last year, Glasgow spent £26 million in sin payments; next year it will get not quite £4 million expenditure on grants under the social fund — reduction to 15 per cent. Knowing, as he does, appalling need and poverty of Glasgow, I do not think hon. Friend the Member for Rutherglen, or any other h Member, could stand up and say that Glasgow wa suitable candidate for that sharp loss of purchasing pow of more than £20 million in the local economy.

Liverpool faces a reduction from more than £8 mill to £1·5 million — a reduction to 18 per ce Manchester's allocation will fall from £6·5 million barely £1 million—again, a reduction to 18 per ce How is it possible to justify these figures? I must admit th all the scepticism that we expressed about the social fund has been not only vindicated, but outdone by events. In retrospect, my hon. Friends and I were trusting and naive in being reluctant to believe that the position could be quite as bad as the figures show it to be.

There is a good reason why Parliament challenged the absolute right of the Crown in the 17th century. It is the same reason why, ever since, Parliament has been reluctant to give any Government absolute discretion that is not tempered by regulation. It is that absolute discretion quickly leads to arbitrary power. I choose my words with care. There is no objective arithmetical way in which one can explain the distribution and allocation that I have outlined to the House. The only possible reason for the ludicrously lopsided allocation is deliberate political bias. It represents the Government's use of unfettered power to reward their own and to penalise ours. The way in which that unfettered power had been manipulated is a scandal and an outrage, and shows that the Government are not to be trusted. Therefore, we shall vote for the amendments, which will provide some restrictions on that unfettered power.

Mr. Ronnie Fearn (Southport): The intention behind my amendment is to give the Secretary of State power to provide extra expenses to enable people at risk from severe weather to protect themselves.

I was glad to see that cold, weather payments are now to have a proper budget. However, I am extremely concerned that the abolition of single payments and their replacement with discretionary loans will cause considerable hardship to people who are already in grave danger at times when we experience exceptionally cold weather like last year's. This particularly affects elderly people, the chronically sick and disabled and very young children, who are accepted as being at risk from severe weather. Such people are already eligible for severe weather payments if they are in receipt of income supplement, but without single payments to provide essential equipment to fight the cold, many people's lives will be put at risk.

The Child Poverty Action Group has told me of a case that provides an excellent example of how the changes could put life at risk and of how my amendment could prevent that. It is that of a single parent, living on supplementary benefit and supporting a child under two years of age. She was moved from partly furnished to unfurnished accommodation because her previous flat was too small. The flat-rate grant was not enough to provide carpets and curtains for the flat. As a result, the health of her small child was at considerable risk from the cold. My amendment would give the Secretary of State the power to intervene and provide extra payments so that that single parent could live without the dangers caused by severe weather.

As well as payments for essential articles for fighting the cold, such as carpets and curtains—many of us do not consider them in that light—payments could also cover grants for blankets and mattresses. More important, grants could provide long-term protection from the cold for those at risk such as the very young, the elderly and the chronically sick. Payments could be utilised to insulate their homes, especially if they are in hard-to-heat homes in areas where they do not qualify for an energy grant. Payments could be made for draughtproofing, hot water cylinder jackets and repairs to defective appliances. Grants could also be provided to help those in need with reconnection charges in an emergency. Many such emergencies occurred last year.

The abolition of single payments will cause considerable problems and put at special risk the poorest and most vulnerable people in our society during exceptionally cold weather.

Mr. Burns: In the light of the fairly dramatic new policies that are coming from whatever name the hon. Gentleman's party now calls itself, can he give the House a categorical assurance that, in addition to wanting to put VAT on food, children's clothes and newspapers, for the next 24 hours his party will not want to put VAT on fuel bills?

Mr. Fearn: If the hon. Gentleman has read some of the statements that appeared in the press—some of them erroneous—and has watched television, he will have found that the statements made were not party statements, but a leader's statements.

Mr. Robin Cook: In that case, one should clarify to the House that the apostrophe comes after the "s" of leaders' and not before it, and that there are two leaders to choose from. The document is signed by both of them. The areas to which they propose to extend VAT include food, children's clothing, newspapers and domestic fuel. The hon. Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) is therefore correct in asking for an assurance.

Mr. Fearn: I shall continue with my speech. My amendment would enable the Secretary of State to relieve hardship and to protect lives. However, as the point is covered by another amendment and I see that it is also within amendment Nos. 23 and 28, I shall not press my amendment.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I compliment my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) on his remarks about the social fund. It is with some sadness that I speak in support of the amendment because Conservative Members should know and Opposition Members certainly know that we should be talking about a huge increase in benefits. My hon. Friend the Member for Livingston was a little too kind to the Minister, to the Secretary of State and indeed to Conservative Members. For weeks I listened to debates in Committee about these benefits and about the horrendous cuts that will be implemented in April. I was shocked yesterday to hear Conservative Members accuse my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) of being emotional. I thought that I was shockproof until I heard what was said in Committee.

I made many notes of the things that the Secretary of State said in answer to vital questions about how people will live from April in the light of some of these cuts and started to consider some of the people who devised this dreadful piece of legislation. One can see where they come from by looking at the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834. Then, as now, some people thought that others should not get sufficient to live on because the principle in that Act was that if they were given as little as possible they would be forced into low-paid jobs. That is part of the Government's strategy.

When I asked the Minister how children live when they leave care and asked for solutions for this or that group of claimants, he gave benign answers of sympathy, such as, "We have listened to the hon. Lady, but"—we always had a "but" at the end. Tht is why my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston has been too kind to Government Members. I have looked into the hearts of those Conservative Members on the Committee and what I saw filled me with a cold chill, because they do not care. That is the crux of the matter. The social fund epitomises everything that went on in Committee. This is the removal of the safety net of the welfare state. Let nobody be in any doubt about that. The consensus has gone.

Over Christmas I went to various groups to meet the claimants—nursery groups and family centres. I met the men and women who use those centres, who are struggling to bring up families on benefits or on very low incomes. I have the dubious honour of representing the constituency with the lowest pay in the country, so I know what I am talking about when I talk about poverty.

I wish to quote some of the comments of those people. One person said:

"The Prime Minister can come round to my house any time. I defy her to show me how I can economise more than I am doing already. Can you tell me how to feed, clothe and care for two children and myself on £25 a week? I have a pound left in my purse. I don't know what we are going to eat for tea."

The women I spoke to, and occasionally a man, are bringing up children on benefits. One or two are on very low incomes, which is what I believe the Government want to force people into. The people feel forgotten. They told me that they are struggling to keep a decent life for themselves and their families. They hate having to live on the means-tested benefit; they do not want it.

I am glad I was not in the House when a Conservative Member referred to youngsters as being idle and not wanting to get out of bed. That is the most gross insult I can think of. During my fact-finding mission I talked to youngsters, and many of them are living on peanuts. Conservative Members could not feed themselves for even half a day on some of the incomes I am talking about.

The people I spoke to were particularly concerned about what will happen to young people when the social fund comes in. My local press ran the most heartbreaking story the week before Christmas. There was a very poignant picture of a 17-year-old woman who wrote a letter to the paper saying:

"Can anybody help me? I live in a maisonette, I have been in it since 6th December. People have helped, but I have no bed, cooker or carpet. I have borrowed a bed. I have a baby due in February and as yet social security has not been able to help me."

We all know that the payment of single benefits was removed, and she was caught in the trap.

"Until now I have been living on £18·75 a week. When the baby comes, how will I boil milk? I live on chips or anything that I can get. I come from a one-parent family and will soon be one myself. Do you think Bob Geldof can help me?"

I felt like writing back and saying, "Yes, because the Government will not." That young woman got help because she publicised her plight. My local press are not supporters of the Labour party. I suffer, as do many Labour Members, because often their values are not my values, and sometimes they come out in support of the new breed of 19th-century liberals who are governing us. Yet the paper said:

"What happened to Nicola Sykes? The pregnant teenager who spent Christmas alone without money or comfort in an empty council flat is not an isolated case. For every Nicola there are doubtless many, many others. While Nico are being met temporarily, this is going to get muc April 1988."

It went on:

"We have no confidence that things will get bet group of people or that the voluntary sector can c In fact, the voluntary sector is now being swamp going under.

I want to return to the point that I made ea consider the thinking the Government Conservative Members who served on the Comm simple fact is—I emphasise this to my hon. F Member for Livingston, who let the Governme hook a little at first—thatthe Government do When I asked the Prime Minister during Quest why we have the highest infant mortality rate an are going in the opposite direction to our E colleagues, she replied that she did not kn Government do not know and Conservative Me not know. I could forgive that, but I have listen Government for weeks and the simple truth is tha not care.

Tonight's little demonstration may have alar offended the sensitivities of Conservative because there was noise. The hon. Member for Ch (Mr. Burns) is shaking his head and no doubt he a chance to speak later. Indeed, it will be a welco to hear from him because he sat in silence earlier a times during those weeks in Committee I w whether we had the deaf and dumb brigade f Government with us because Conservative Memb not willing to speak. If Conservative Membe impressed by that anger tonight, they must be aw they are storing up even more anger. I have spoke young people and I can tell the Government that pay for that anger.

We have a divided Britain, and the social f divide it even further. Conservative Members wil as swamped in their constituencies with people co them as I will be in mine. Conservative Members get away with this. The anger will manifest itself which Conservative Members will dislike.

The hon. Member for Derbyshire, We McLoughlin), who has just come into the Chamb this highly amusing. There is nothing amusing poverty. We noticed that attitude in Committee. W spoke about people trying to maintain decent l benefit, Conservative Members sat in Committee writing Christmas cards and passing each other litt That was disgraceful behaviour and it reflects w Government have done by introducing the soci The whole country will pay for the devastation t rotten legislation will produce.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Gove amendments Nos. 43 and 44, dealt with debt collected from people in Northern Ireland. I want t the concerns of my colleagues and others in N Ireland about the implications of the social fund.

The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. propounded the theory that the social fund wou Conservative constituencies. If that is so, it is amazi in Northern Ireland, if my memory is corre percentage social fund allocation to the of Ballymena is the largest of all. Very few people contend that the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. I. Paisley) is a noted supporter of the Government. However, this point highlights the real problem. There does not seem to be any rhyme or reason behind the allocation of the fund.

I want to speak for a few moments on behalf of an area that is recognised by most people to be remarkably deprived in terms of basic wages. Indeed, the region has the highest rates for housekeeping, fuel and grocery expenses. Some people wonder where the funds will come from in the future. We are still waiting for details about the social fund, although a Northern Ireland Minister gave us some information a short time ago. In most areas at least £1 million will be taken out of the purchasing economy. It is a matter not just of the recipients suffering, but of the ongoing impact on a community. Before the fund is implemented, I ask that deeper consideration be given to it. I support the concept of the amendment, which should be obligatory on the Secretary of State rather than permissive.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I apologise to the House for not being here for the start of the debate on these amendments, but I assure the House that I was present throughout the Committee stage of the Bill, and, that of its predecessor, which was just as awful. I find it interesting to note the number of Tory Members who have gained a tongue since they came down from the Committee Corridor. Perhaps the air up there is too rarefied for them to be able to speak, and perhaps the Services Committee could attend to that. It is incredible that a major piece of social vandalism is to be visited upon the people of this country, yet not one Tory Member has a word to say about it, other than to parrot what the Minister tells him to parrot in Committee.

The people in my community will face many problems because of the introduction of the social fund. The hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. M. Smyth) mentioned the loss of £1 million in his community. I deplore that—it is appalling—but I wish that we were losing only £1 million from our community. There is something deeply offensive, unpleasant and unfair about the social fund. It is unfair because it takes away the right of people to gain a benefit, a single payment, and hands it over to the discretionary power of the Minister.

The Minister can hide. He will not be sitting at a counter in the Archway Tower, with a piece of plate glass between himself and applicants for social fund benefit, telling them no and watching their anger as they suddenly discover that what they could get as a right is now a discretionary matter. The Minister will be hiding away in his plush office at the Elephant and Castle. A poor, low-paid civil servant will have to face the ire of those who have lost their benefits because of the social fund.

What is even more evil about this measure is that there is no appeal against these arbitrary decisions. Applicants will go to the DHSS, desperate to get help which, at the moment, is available, and will be told, "No, the money has run out this month. Come back next month." The money will have run out again and they will be told to come back the following month. They will be at the end of a vicious queue, or they will be offered something through the loan fund. We are not even certain how the loan fund will operate, because the Minister was remarkably coy about that.

If the amendments are carried this evening — I sincerely hope that they will be, although I have my doubts —they will serve to put some semblance of fairness and order into this part of the Bill. The Minister may grin and say, "Oh, well, here the Labour party goes again, moaning about social security. Soon it will all be over and I can forget about it." I am happy to tell the Minister and the House that that is not the case because the anger and chaos are only just beginning. Pent-up frustrations will boil over on 1 April, or some time during April, when the first office runs out of its social fund grant money or when loans are refused and people suffer because the social fund is cut for the succeeding year when others cannot afford to pay back the money.

All sorts of action will be taken, but what makes me angry is the complacency and arrogance with which the Government have introduced these measures and the way in which Ministers will sit back and leave it to a dispute between local civil servants, who do not want to implement this horrible system, and local people in poor communities who do not want the system. They merely want to live with some decency and self-respect. The poverty in which they live has been visited upon them by the economic policies of a Government who do not care about these people.

It is not those people's fault. Like my hon. Friends, I want to see a social security system which will not allow a Minister to have discretion over the amount of money that he does not give to a poor inner-city area and a system which will not put low-level civil servants in the awful position of having to decide who gets that money. We want a guarantee of basic living standards and incomes for everyone in this country, which, as the seventh richest country in the world, could easily afford it.

The Government do not want to spend money on that. They do not care about poor people. They would rather give away the money in tax relief so that the very rich can build their swimming pools and buy their BMWs and their homes abroad. They would rather spend it on nuclear weapons than on the poorest people, who are desperately crying out for help.

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) is worried about payments during exceptionally cold weather. He will be pleased to see that, next winter, the social fund will continue to make exceptionally cold weather payments. Although the supplementary benefits system will end, and with it the single payments system, there will continue to be exceptionally cold weather payments.

I remind the hon. Gentleman of a couple of points about the social fund which may go some way towards meeting his anxieties. He mentioned the problem of meeting the expenses of reconnection. The fuel direct scheme exists for consumers of electricity and gas. If they are in the vulnerable groups, they will be covered by the code of practice on winter disconnections. Budgeting loans will be available under the social fund to help people with their bills for the fuels that cannot be covered by the fuel direct scheme, including coal, oil and bottled gas. In some cases, community care grants — not loans — will be available for reconnection, depending upon the status of the applicant. In other cases, budgeting loans will be available for that purpose. Crisis loans may be available too, to avoid danger or damage to the health and safety of someone in the family.

[Mr. Portillo]

I do not suggest that we accept the hon. Gentleman's amendment. I simply remind him that so..ething like the exceptionally cold weather scheme will exist next winter, in the light of our experience this winter, and that those payments will not be made from the budgeted part of the social fund. I hope that that will be of interest and comfort to him.

We are speaking against the background of the total reform of the income-related social security benefits system. As part of that reform, an extra £200 million will be put into the money that is available for families. An important part of the reform is the fact that, in future, claimants will not be dependent upon bits and pieces of additional money which they can build up. Their needs will be addressed through premiums which are relevant to their circumstances. There will be premiums for families, for the disabled and for the elderly. We must look for the best way of enabling people to meet unusual and sometimes fairly large needs, and we believe that the social fund will fill the gap.

The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) said that there were two social funds. There is only one social fund, but it is useful to think of it as being in two parts—budgeted and non-budgeted. But I did not understand the hon. Gentleman's point. He should have welcomed the fact that maternity, funeral and exceptionally cold weather payments will not be limited by the budget, but will be determined by the demand for them.

The hon. Gentleman and several other hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), made great play of the fact that there would be no redress under the new system. I wearied the Committee by explaining the system of review that would be instituted. First, the social fund officer could review the case. It could be reviewed by his line manager in the local office, or by the social fund inspector. Sitting above all that will be the social fund commissioner responsible for ensuring the quality of the decisions of social fund inspectors.

Although I mentioned this several times in Committee, I do not think that I have reminded the House that, during the passage of the Social Security Bill in July 1986, Lord Denning said in another place that his experience of appeals that had come to his court was that the machinery was far too long, elaborate and costly, with "too many insurance commissioners and the like."

He added:

"It is all very well to have that elaborate structure in the pursuit of justice, but if it is too elaborate, it ought to be replaced by simpler machinery . . . I see this new proposal coming from the Commons as being simple, fair and just machinery." — [Official Report, House of Lords 24 July 1986; Vol. 479, c. 426.]

The hon. Member for Livingston also raised a point about computers. The software programme is on target for helping the social fund officers to run the social fund budget, and computer training will be given next week. I wearied the Committee by explaining that the money would not run out, and I seem to have half succeeded with the hon. Member for Livingston. He now understands that it will not run out halfway through the year, and thinks that it will run out halfway through each month. That will not happen. We have a programme so that social fund officers can be aware of the priorities placed on the budget, establish their system of priorities and deal wit accordingly. That is not a very unusual proc people in this world have to operate within b

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Minister tell us how h that the system of priorities will be consiste office to another, and that different decision made in different offices to fit within the cash social fund?

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Gentleman, w assiduous member of the Committee, will ha that there is a thick social fund manual, guidance. The social fund officer therefore disposal both directions from the Secretary c considerable guidance to help him to make h

In certain circumstances, the officer will be a claim for up to 28 days, so that he can com other claims coming in over the same perio thinks may have similar priorities.

Mrs. Mahon: Will the Minister explain happen in one of the cases that I mentioned to will happen to a woman with two or three ch cooker blows up and the officer holds the c days? What if it is in the middle of winter and produce any warm food?

Mr. Portillo: I am disappointed in the hon. was also a member of the Committee. She wil cookers, and mothers with children, are at th list of the social fund officer's priorities.

Mrs. Mahon: I spent some time talking to rights benefit campaign organiser in Halifax, w me—as did the citizens advice bureau orga the first pay claimants on the community gra people without homes and people coming out that the whole grant would be taken up by priority groups. They suspected that nothing w for the other cases that the Minister has men

Mr. Portillo: I can only reiterate that an a a social fund loan who is in the position that th describes will be given high priority.

Mr. Robin Cook: Some time ago th committed himself to an important propositi that the social fund would not run out. He will it is a cash-limited fund. Is he willing to give th assurance that he is confident that all pri popping up on the computer programme will that no applicant will be turned away becaus are not there to meet his case?

Mr. Portillo: Of course I am not saying saying that the highest priority cases will be n have been trying to get across to the hon. G that there is no magic day of the month—th 15th or the 28th—when the money will run o the social fund officers will manage the fund in as to meet the priorities across every month They will be able to do that because they have of single payments. Some £118 million was spe payments to 17 November 1987. That puts u for spending about £190 million on single payn year. That figure compares with the £203 mi made available under the social fund. Perhaps another valid point is the fact that the £203 million is in addition to about £8 billion being spent on supplementary benefit.

Mr. Corbyn: I realise that the Minister is trying hard to put a thick coat of gloss paint over this nasty piece of the Bill, but he has not answered the question. The manual advises social fund officers what priority they should accord to cases that appear at their offices. He has not said how he can ensure that an applicant in Halifax is likely to get the same payment as one in Bognor Regis in any month of the year. It seems clear to many of us who have sat through the Committee stage and looked through the social fund manual that there is no mechanism—and that none is intended—to ensure equity of decisions throughout the country.

Mr. Portillo: I shall return to what the hon. Gentleman said about allocations, but he will know how we have striven to achieve balance and fairness between offices. He is trying to achieve something that is unobtainable. It is impossible to ensure that the chances of securing a council house in Islington are the same as in Hackney. Even under the single payment system one cannot ensure that outgoings are always the same, because there will always be grey cases which are treated differently. We have produced a thick social fund manual which gives clear guidance to social fund officers, which will go a long way to ensure that like cases are treated alike.

Rev. Martin Smyth: The Minister gave the figures to November. I am not sure what happens in Great Britain, but it is alleged, and the figures that I have seen confirm it, that in Northern Ireland—there is no Northern Ireland Minister here to answer my question—between April and November 1987 a different pattern was introduced for single payments, which has reduced the amount given to bring it into line with the new figures. Can the Minister give us the total of payments for the previous full year so that we may compare that figure with the social fund provisions?

Mr. Portillo: I think that the hon. Gentleman is referring to the changes in the single payment regime made in August 1986. The cost in 1985-86 was £335 million.

The allocation that is being made is such as to be broadly in line with the amount spent on single payments in the current year. I shall take the example that the hon. Member for Livingston gave—Glasgow, Provan—where the allocation for the social fund is £1·5 million, compared with expenditure on single payments from April to December 1987 of £1 million. There is little difference between the amount being made available and what was paid out in the last period for which figures are available. I regret that I do not have the figures for Bathgate, but I imagine that the picture is similar.

Mrs. Wise: Is the Minister saying that money for grants is the same as money for loans?

Mr. Portillo: I think that the hon. Lady heard me. The amount of money being made available for the budgeted element of the social fund, which is loans and grants together, is higher than the amount being paid at the moment in single payments.

The allocation between the offices was mathematically determined. It was based on the 32 weeks to April 1987. We then made some adjustment to that. The reason for what is only a limited adjustment was that we could not see any reason why single payments varied so much fr one office to another. We felt that it would not be righ base the allocation of the social fund entirely on the hist of single payments, and that we should also take ac account of the measure of underlying need. Because we not want to force the pace of any change, the extent which we allowed for that underlying need was v limited. The formula was made up of one seventh on basis of need and six sevenths on the basis of the siz payments made by an office over a recent period.

I stress to the hon. Member for Livingston that th is no estimate of what will happen in the future. I am very clear where he picked that up. We put a note in Library explaining the one seventh-six sevenths split; t is between need—one seventh—and single payment six sevenths. There is no guess what will happen in future. We wanted to know the best possible indicatio need and we took advice from the Social Policy Resea Unit. We were told that the best possible measure was supplementary benefit case load.

If the hon. Member for Livingston is saying that should have regard only to what single payments h been in the past and pay no regard to the underlying ne that we should have no regard to how many in an a receive supplementary benefit, or the make-up of th people, as between elderly, disabled and so forth, I am v surprised at what he says. I want to say very firmly t it is absolutely untrue that there has been any connivan or manipulation of these figures. We have gone to trouble of placing in the Library the exact method which the calculation was made. The hon. Gentleman I am sorry to say this to him—does not seem to h gone to the trouble of reading it carefully, because seems to have misunderstood one crucial point.

I am pleased that the hon. Member for Belfast, So (Rev. M. Smyth) recognised that there was no politi bias in this, and he gave an example of the way in wh the matter has been worked out. The hon. Member Livingston can take the piece of paper placed in Library, do the figures himself and apply the formula, a he will find that it is exactly as I have said. If he is say that just because in one area the level of single payme has run at a particular level, for no reason which he c can explain, and is not related to any recognised meas of underlying need, and that we should have no regard the supplementary benefit case load, I am very surpris

I hope that in the course of my remarks I have cove the points that were made in the debate. The social fu has now been debated extensively in Committee a before that, during the passage of the Bill which is now Social Security Act 1986. It is now time to get on w implementing the social fund and, in view of what I h said about the relative budgets of the single paym system and the social fund, we have every reason to beli that this will be a very successful scheme.

Mr. Robin Cook: The Minister said that the purpose the reform of social security introduced in 1986, which w be fully in place by this April, was to do away with extra additions to pay to those claiming welfare benef In the context of this debate, of course, never was a tr word spoken. Under the social fund, not only will there no additions; for the first time there will be compulso deductions of benefit when people repay those loans. I a aware of a certain ambivalence on my part in this deb in that I am pressing the Minister for a larger ceiling to social fund, pressing him for a more generous budget so that more claimants can obtain money from the fund, but at the same time I am gravely concerned about what will happen to even those claimants who succeed in obtaining money from the social fund, because there will be a very serious problem of success in their case in that, in three cases out of four, they will have to repay it. Those who succeed will in many cases be those who end up in worst hardship.

9.45 pm

We come to the biggest irony of all in the new structure — that those who are trapped in greatest hardship, because they are losing £6 a week in automatic deductions, will find when they apply for additional help that they are automatically disqualified because they will be held under the social fund manual not to have sufficient benefit to repay a further loan. Therefore, they will be disqualified from getting a further advance from the social fund. So the very people who will then be in the greatest need will be disqualified from the one available form of assistance that the Government have allowed.

I listened with great care to what the Minister said about the cash-limited fund not running out and in that respect being unique among such funds. As I understood what he told the House, the fund will not run out, because it will be rationed on a day-to-day basis. That is effectively what the Minister said. If the money seems to be inadequate to cope with the numbers coming in, the computer programme will automatically adjust the qualification by shifting the cut-off point further up the list of priorities, with the result that in some offices priority cases will succeed which down the road in a different local office, where there is tighter pressure on the budget, would not succeed.

It is not good enough for the Minister to defend that anomaly by saying that in some areas it has always been possible to get a council house more easily than in other areas. Until the invention of the social fund, there was never any area in Britain in which it was not possible to get one's legal rights to social security because that area did not have the money. Until April 1988, every claimant anywhere in Britain would have been entitled to the same payments under the same regulations without limits on the cash.

The other area where the Minister showed a breathtaking sleight of hand, although I understand that my colleagues became familiar with it in Committee, was in comparing the allocation under the social fund with the single payments expenditure after the cuts of 1986. He discovered that there was no cut and indeed prided himself on having discovered a modest increase. It is ludicrously unreasonable and unmathematical to compare the position after the cuts with the position next year rather than with the position before the Government got to work with the scissors. In 1986-87, expenditure on single payments was well over £300 million. It is that figure that has to be compared with the allocation for social fund payments of £201 million next year.

The cuts were severe. The Minister referred to a mother with children and no cooker being a priority candidate. In my constituency I have a family without a cooker who cannot get a single payment to replace that cooker because under his new rules, announced in 1986, that family will not qualify for another payment for ano because it got an inadequate payment to pu 18 months ago. That cooker has broke grant will be offered to replace or repair i

In another case, where there is a seve wets the bed, the washing machine has bro mother will not be given a single payme washing machine because she got a grant to buy it. Therefore, she will have to wait 1 she can repair the machine.

Another constituent, an invalid, no reclining chair because the reclining chair f a single payment last year collapsed. She grant to repair it for another two years unt period is up. That illustrates the real hard the cuts of 1986. It is wrong for the Mini to compare and contrast only what happe cuts with the allocation for next year.

Even if we accept that as the base point, that the allocation of that inadequate sum been fairly and evenly done. I cannot co formula that allows only one seventh fo purposes should have such a ludicrously that expenditure in my area will go down b that in Bognor Regis will go up by two t massive difference. In fact, if we subtrac other we are talking about a difference o That cannot be explained by a one-seventh formula. It has to be explained by some fac be that a political bias was not applied a were spewed out from the computer. Th may well have been applied when the form up.

In no way can the social security syste counter-agency of regional policy to redi from the north and from inner-city areas o the south coast of England, giving money when the Minister is not prepared to give offices in areas of the greatest multiple de

Order for Third Reading read.

Queen's consent having been signified—

10.8 pm

Mr. Scott: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I am told that the Bill is a short one judged by social security standards, but it has been subject to considerable discussion in Committee and in the two days t spent on Report. Whatever the Opposition n Bill, in essence, is about three things: trainin and some element of tidying up social securit and putting it on a firmer footing. I do not wa each of those categories in any detail because they have been discussed at length in Committ course of the debates on amendments and ne Report. By training I mean the decision to r guarantee of the offer of a training place to 16 olds. In the Bill we have said that benefit available to those who are neither in education and who turn down a training place. I cannot the comments of the hon. Member for Livi Cook), who represented this as an appallin those in this age group, can be sustained. I ca that any hon. Member would wish to see you or 17 with the option of a training place tur exchange for idleness and dependence on be

Some hon. Members have characterised element of compulsion, of forcing young training schemes, but that is not right. An choice remains. If I must put the argument a I cannot see why the state should be comp benefit to those who decline the offer of a t in those circumstances. The quality of train availability of training places will be such period it will be seen that this was a wise, sen protect young people from the dangers of idl offer them real opportunities to acquire skills them for adult life.

On the question of targeting—I understa has become a dirty word for the Oppositio spend a vast sum on social security benefit. I year it will be about £48 billion. I cannot beli sensible or responsible Administration shou than seek to ensure that that money is directe needs as accurately and in as well targete possible. We are seeking to do that with so measures.

By putting the exceptionally cold weather p to a regulated basis, and by providing a statut local authority emergency payments and for t the welfare food scheme, we are also seekin existing social security legislation.

I wish to touch on only two further matt conclude. This may be a unique occasion, in to compliment the hon. Members for Cove East (Mr. Nellist) and for Preston (Mrs. Wise) although I do not see the hon. Gentleman in pursuing in Committee with insistence and cause of the under-twos on attendance allowa the way in which they pursued that issue, I wo been moved to return to the medical evide Because of that, yesterday I could give the undertaking about the need to review this wh the context of the OPCS reports and the ou survey on community care by Sir Roy Griff admit that I started by accepting the recei about the dividing line at the age of t Committee moved me to query that and it benefit of children under the age of two who disability.

In Committee, Opposition Front-Bench M particularly the hon. Member for Caern Wigley), asked about the small group of seve people who come on to benefit after April and who will be less well treated than those who are at present on benefit. I had hoped that by Third Reading I would be able to come forward with specific proposals to meet their needs. If by any chance it were necessary for legislative provision to be made for this small group, I am satisfied that existing legislative powers would enable me to meet those needs.

As I said at Question Time yesterday, at present I am pursuing a solution that will depend on the voluntary sector. A small number of people are involved, and when we have the OPCS and Griffiths reports we will be able to consider a long-term solution. This will be a short-term solution for a small number of people, and it needs to be addressed in a flexible way. Perhaps the voluntary sector might be the most appropriate way of helping them. In this area, too, during the Committee and remaining stages of the Bill we have made some progress towards meeting the needs of an important group of people who are in need of extra help.

I was urged by one of my hon. Friends to find a solution for all time to a particular aspect of social security. I suspect that members of the Opposition Front Bench realise that we are likely to be back with more social security legislation in the not-too-distant future. Nothing is for ever in this area: we are spending the Government's largest single budget on it, and it would be foolish to think that one could fossilise the provision that is made. We shall constantly be trying to improve our provision and to target it better in the interests of those who are most in need of help in our community. I believe that the Bill is an important step forward in the three directions that I have identified, and I commend it to the House.

Mrs. Beckett: I listened with interest to the Minister's argument and his description of the Bill's aims as being those of training, targeting and tidying up. What a pity that every one of those categories means less provision for the people covered by the Bill.

By the standards of this Administration, this is not a major social security Bill. We are not dealing here with millions of losers, nor are we discussing losses and savings of millions of pounds. However, the Bill is part of the Government's drive, as the Minister plainly said, to target help—in the Government's phrase—on those in greatest need, by which it becomes daily more apparent that they mean giving help only to those in greatest need, which is a definition that grows harsher with every year that the Government remain in power. The Minister spoke of the vast amount spent on the social security budget, and the figures are incontestable. What is equally incontestable is the greatly increased area of need, which has grown partly as a direct result of the Government's economic policies.

The Bill is not a major social security Bill. It affects only epileptics such as Dorothy Moran, who lose their chance of drawing a maximum of about £30 in attendance allowance—in the cause, as the Minister said, of tidying up the law. It affects only those whose industrial injuries were severe enough to entitle them to the maximum reduced earnings allowance, and who stand to lose more than £19 a week when they retire. It affects only young people of 16 and 17 who already have diminished prospects — not only those who, as Conservative Members have often said and as the Minster has hinted, have rejected the chance to work, train or participate in a Government training scheme.

Every young person between the ages of 16 and 17 will be deprived of his right to benefit, apart from a few who will be granted it as a graceful gesture by the Government of the basis of a few, tightly defined exceptions. Such definitions may well exclude, for example, some who have endured sexual and physical abuse at home, and result in decisions that will not be subject to appeal. For low-income families, the measures will mean that their incomes will drop by £11·50 a week—a minor matter for those who are not in poverty themselves.

The Bill covers only large numbers of women, especially carers, who will lose their right to unemployment and sickness benefit, because the Government—they tell us that it is in the cause of strengthening the national insurance scheme — are tightening up the contribution conditions. It is unfortunate that, because of the Government's desire to strengthen the national insurance basis of the scheme, so many women and others are likely to lose.

The Bill will affect only those forced into so-called voluntary early retirement because of the shortage of employment and perhaps more especially because of the paucity of unemployment benefit. That benefit is bereft of any earnings-related addition and forces people to beggar themselves in their later years by facing the severe financial penalty imposed on those who draw early on their occupational pension to which, of course, they have contributed throughout their working lives.

It will affect people in the police and fire services who have made substantial occupational pension contributions on top of their national insurance contributions. They will be told that one of these rights for which they have paid for and for which, if they stay in employment, they will continue to pay is to be unilaterally withdrawn.

It affects only the very poorest in the land who might be forced to seek help from the DHSS for needs that they cannot meet and which no previous Government have ever expected them to meet from subsistence-level weekly benefits. The resources available for their unmet needs will be cut to the bone, if not beyond it, by the minuscule budgets of the social fund, which on average—especially in the poorer areas—have been cut by about 83 per cent. as a sign of the further support available to those who are by definition the poorest.

The Minister of State told us that none of those things is being done to cut back or to save, but that they are being done to make sure that help is offered only to those who by the Government's declining standards really need it.

Some of the arguments that we heard in discussions on the Bill were pathetic. We have heard the argument that Dorothy Moran and people like her will have to lose their entitlement to benefit because the Government would like to tidy up the law. The Minister assured us that the provisions in the Bill which deal with the Moran judgment are financially neutral and of no real significance to the Government. They are of significance only to the few thousand people like Dorothy Moran who will lose the opportunity to receive that tiny bit of further help for which they would not even be seriously considered unless they were already facing substantial difficulties.

We are told, and the Minister has repeated, that the provisions which deal with 16 and 17-year-olds do not represent compulsion. Of course they do not—perish the thought. It is just that, if the young people who are involved do not do what the Government say, they will not get any money to live on and their families will not get any money to support them. That distinction is sufficiently fine for bodies such as the Manpower Services Commission and all the youth training scheme providers to be unable to follow it.

I should like to place it on record, as we did in Committee, that we do not think that the Government are in a position to guarantee enough YTS places—even if that were an adequate measure of what should be offered to young people—by the time that this Bill becomes law, if it becomes law. We certainly do not think that there is the slightest chance of there being enough places of the right quality. As my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) said, it was most noticeable that the Government did not begin to consider any qualification that we put forward of what might be a satisfactory offer of a place on some course rather than merely any old offer that could be found to make up the numbers. The Government will be desperate to make up the numbers before April.

It is simply not good enough for the Minister of State casually to say that of course it will be all right and that all places are of good quality. The record of injury and even of death on YTS programmes is not such that anybody can treat proposals of that sort with complacency. When we asked in Committee about the quality of YTS places and about what will happen if the restricted period of entitlement to child benefit or bridging allowance or the other elements of the provision should run out before a proper offer of a place had been made, the only answer we received was that it would not happen between January and April. The Government said that somehow the Department would find what independent estimates have suggested is possibly 100,000 extra places. The Minister assures us that they will all be high-quality places.

The justifications which have been offered for the Bill at many of its stages have been weak, and they were weakest in the debate yesterday. The Minister referred to that debate, and I am grateful to him for the tribute he paid to some of my hon. Friends who raised matters in Committee and in the House. I join him in paying tribute to the tremendous work they have done.

Although the Minister was affected by the case put, which was enormously strong and one would have thought would affect anyone, I was astonished and appalled by the spectacle we saw in the Chamber yesterday. A number of Conservative Members, some of them new Members, suggested that they could not support a provision that would give much-needed help to the families of desperately sick children under the age of two because a Labour Government did not do it. What a pathetic argument.

Those hon. Members rose magnificently above the clear indication that when the last Labour Government left office there was very little experience of the way in which the scheme was working and decided they would ignore that. Some of them argued that they could not support the proposal because they did not like the other proposals put forward by the Opposition in Committee. Presumably they feel that if they support one proposal they must support all of them. It is a novel suggestion and one which we would commend. We do not expect 100 per cent. support from Conservative Members, but we expect them to listen and sometimes to be affected by reasonable argument.

The cream of the debate was the suggestion that the measure could not be supported because some Conservative Members did not like the tone of the debate. I am sure that the parents of those desperately sick and disabled children will be very sympathetic to that argument. Are these men or mice? They seem to be incapable of responding with any sensitivity to the arguments. If their Government, for whatever reason—however poor we may think the justification—say they have to resist the amendment, that is one thing; but to treat with such contempt serious argument on problems and difficulties is frankly contemptible.

It is strange that some Conservative Members can be so easily dissuaded from pressing the Government who tell us they have money to burn, or at least money that they are prepared to give away in tax cuts, with the bias favouring those who are already the most wealthy.

That carries the seeds of danger for them as a party and a Government. It may carry the seeds of danger for our whole society. I find it hard to believe that anyone could take pride in voting for the Bill. When my hon. Friends and I consider the amendments we have discussed and the debates we have had in Committee and on Report, we know quite certainly that we are right to vote against it.

Mr. Corbyn: I wish to put some things on the record. First, I refer to the expert way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) led my hon. Friends in Committee and to the expertise that she brought to it. I cannot help thinking what an excellent job she would do as Minister for Social Security, because she is concerned about poverty and the need for a social security system that eliminates rather than exacerbates poverty.

Having sat through the Committee on the Bill and the previous Bill, I believe that we live in total unreality. Outside the House, only five minutes walk away, people are living in a cardboard city, with no houses to go to. People are being evicted to make way for property speculators and are living on the streets of London and every other major city. People on every housing estate throughout the country cannot make ends meet. We have the greatest poverty since the war, with 6 million people living below the European poverty threshold.

What does the Bill do? Does it address those problems? Does it say that we will examine the problems of the poor and ensure that the social security system is a genuine safety net? No. The Bill is like taking a pair of scissors to a safety net. It makes holes in the safety net and creates misery and poverty.

I have considered some of the points in the Bill. It deals with the question of the young unemployed. We have heard Tory press stories about feckless youth and young people who do not want work, who are workshy and are trying to get money from the Government. That is utter and absolute bunkum and nonsense, and the Government know it. They know that in reality young people become very depressed at school if they know that there are no jobs for them to go to. They do not become very excited at the prospect of a YTS place instead of a job. When they are told that they will be coerced on to a scheme, they become positively angry. Who can blame them for that? The Bill is a step towards industrial conscription. The Government intend to introduce industrial conscription to low-wage jobs with a "no hope" future for young people who are the worst trained and worst educated of any industrial country. The Bill is part of that process.

Other sections of the Bill deal with income support, the treatment of people with disabilities and the need for support for carers. There is a thread running through the Bill of parsimony and nastiness in the way in which the regulations operate, until we come to the worst part of the Bill dealing with the social fund and the way in which that operates. Indeed, we have just debated that point.

This is the second Social Security Bill that we have had in a relatively short time. I believe that we will be back here again very soon because there will be much opposition to the way in which the Bill will operate. The Government are very good at producing what they call "fact sheets" on social security. They are very nicely produced, and I commend them. Indeed, they are beautifully produced. It is unfortunate that they have such an ill purpose and that they seek not to eliminate poverty, but to explain why the Government are not prepared to spend public money on eliminating poverty.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South has explained, the Government are more interested in tax concessions to allow a small minority of very wealthy people to live a life of conspicuous consumption while they allow the large number of very poor people to rot. I want a Social Security Bill to be introduced that guarantees living standards, guarantees to eliminate poverty in our society and takes away the threat of coercion implicit in this Bill.

From next April there will be an even greater division in our country between the rich and the poor. There will also be an enormous burden on the people who work in the DHSS to carry out the regulations. Those people are being given insufficient advice and training now. There are staff cuts and they are threatened by privatisation and all the other things that Tory Governments dream up for public servants. We will end up with the problem of low-paid civil servants dealing with very poor people on the other side of the counter, with all the tensions and frictions that that creates.

I feel certain that we will be back fairly soon, because the Bill is unworkable. I hope that it will be very closely monitored if, unfortunately, it receives its Third Reading and is carried into law. I hope that it will be carefully watched from the time that it becomes law and that every possible challenge will be mounted against it so that the Government will be forced to bring in regulations in respect of the social fund, forced to look again at various aspects of the Bill and forced to come back to the House with another Social Security Bill that at least recognises that the job of the DHSS is to eliminate poverty, not to create a labyrinth of legal restrictions that prevent the DHSS from paying people the support and aid that is necessary for them to enjoy a decent existence.

Mrs. Wise: The Minister said that the Bill was about training, targeting and tidying up. I congratulate him on finding some pattern in the Bill, even though it is only one of alliteration. I thought that the Bill was a hotch-potch of ideas, the only connecting link of which was that it made people's positions worse. The common thread was tha made worse the position of people of different ages and different circumstances.

The Government had two lines of argument. So clauses were said to affect very few people, were important, would not cost very much and were not wo bothering about. Other clauses would affect many peo and would cost an enormous amount. They could not s "The country cannot afford it," because they keep telling us that the country is in an unparalleled state prosperity, but they certainly said, "It will cost enormous amount and we cannot do it." It was confus to take part in debates, sometimes following immediat after each other, where those mutually exclusive lines thought were advanced, but we became accustomed t in Committee and learned to deal with it.

I am slightly inhibited tonight by the Ministe generous praise of the efforts of my hon. Friend Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) a myself to extend the attendance allowance to babies a under two. I am grateful for that praise and I am glad t we produced some movement. I read carefully Minister's statement on the matter at the conclusion yesterday's debate. He said:

"The advice that I have received confirms that, as h Members argued in Committee, these babies have attenda needs which exceed those of a normal child."

The hon. Members to whom he referred were Opposition Members. It cannot have been easy for him concede that we were right. Having said that 3,(children a year were affected, and that to do what wanted would cost £7 million a year, the Minis concluded his useful and interesting observations saying:

"If the hon. Lady is not willing to withdraw the new clau I ask the House to reject it, but against the background c recognition that support for the families of disabled child throughout the age range will now inescapably be part of system."—[Official Report, 12 January 1988; Vol. 125, 237-38.]

All the Conservatives Members then voted against it.

Our problem is that we do not know what the Minis meant. Will those provisions become part of the syst now, or will they become part of it in the fulness of tir In the fulness of time, the under-twos will cease to be un two. Their parents will find it incomprehensible that Minister has considered the matter and is grateful for advice of the Opposition, yet there will be no movem until those children are aged over two. I hope the Minis means that when the Bill goes to the other place Government will introduce an amendment to put words into effect and the provision "now inescapab into the social security system.

I hope, too, that the Members of the other place consider carefully the other arguments of the Oppositi which are equally cogent and correct. They inclu arguments on carers, and on the iniquity of putting working-class poor into debt. Officially, for the first ti they will be encouraged—nay, coerced—into going i debt. Debt has been the great scourge and fear of worki people over generations. Now the state is saying, "You be in debt to us, and instead of being the final safety n the state will be your creditor."

I urge those in the other place to continue arguments, to note that there has been some movement the minds, if not the votes, of Conservative Members a to try to rescue some elements of the social security system from the damage that the passage of the Bill will do tonight.

I echo what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) about the valiant efforts of our hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett). It was in some ways a joy to serve on the Committee, although the material of the Bill was so deplorable. It was good to be working as part of a team defending people who need defending, and it was in some respects a model of what Committee proceedings can be.

Of course, the Opposition always have the problem of being grossly under-resourced compared to Ministers. We delighted in seeing the scurrying, the notes and the hasty consultations between the many advisers helping the Minister, and we looked with great favour and approbation at our single, solitary adviser, Tony Lynes, without whom we could not have done the job which even the future Opposition—the present Government—must surely concede was done.

The Government should bear in mind, however, that we also had alongside us, offering us briefings and help, many voluntary organisations. I know that, being non-party political bodies, they will undoubtedly have been offering the same help to Conservative Members, but they will have noticed that the Members of Parliament who responded to their pleas, who read their briefings carefully and took account of them—indeed, understood them—were Opposition Members.

For many years the Conservative party has made the voluntary organisations appear to be its fiefdom. Those days have now gone. Voluntary organisations of all kinds, dealing with all the topics related to health, social security, disability, women—the "establishment" of the women's movement, as my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) described them yesterday, as well as the radical elements — were putting forward items and suggestions that Opposition Members took up. That will not leave the political situation untouched.

Although the Government may defeat us in the Lobby tonight, we have consistently won every argument, day after day. It has been worth putting it on the record. The Government's numbers in the Lobby will not ultimately prevail. We will have a great deal of work to do to undo the damage that they have done, but sooner or later our day will come.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Income and Corporation Taxes Bill

[Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

10.56 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill consolidates enactments relating to income tax and corporation tax. The last such consolidation took place in 1970 and the additions and amendments to the law made by each subsequent Finance Act have made a new consolidation exercise necessary. The Bill is pure consolidation. No amendment to the present law is made.

The House will recognise, if only from the massive bulk of the Bill—it contains 845 clauses and more than 1,000 pages — that the work of consolidation represents a formidable achievement on the part of those concerned. We owe a debt of gratitude especially to the draftsman who worked for over four years to produce the Bill. She had to deal not only with the legislation as it existed but with all the Finance Acts each year, including two Finance Acts last year. If I were a farmer, I would give the Bill a pat.

I should, however, make it clear that there are a number of technical amendments which will have to be dealt with in Committee in the fairly near future. I make that clear for the technical experts who scrutinise the text in the meantime.

The Bill has been passed in another place where, in the usual way, it was referred to the Joint Committee on Consolidation, &c., Bills. That Committee reported that the Bill is pure consolidation. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): It is not right that either laymen or lawyers should have to pick their way through the coded messages put through the House over a period of 17 years. I am a strong and long-standing enthusiast of consolidation.

I want to ask the Minister only one question. The Bill says that there will be a table of derivations. May we also have a table of destinations so that we may know legislatively not only where we have been but where we are going?

This is one of those occasions when one can ingratiate oneself with the Speaker and hope to be encouraged to speak again, and one can ingratiate oneself with one's Scottish comrades. I so do, and I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Committee of Selection (Special Report)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House takes note of the Special Report from the Committee of Selection of 9th December, relating to the Scottish Affairs Committee.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment standing in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

11 pm

Sir Marcus Fox (Shipley): My contribution to this debate will be much shorter than the one I made in the debate on 2 December because of the need to hear what colleagues and friends from Scotland on both sides of the House and other hon. Members have to say in this short debate. There is a major difference between the previous debate when we were seeking approval for our nominations and this debate when we are merely asking for advice and instruction. It is not often that Committees come to the House with that objective in mind.

I shall briefly recount the reasons why the Committee felt the need to produce its special report. As the House will know, the Committee of Selection has the duty of bringing before the House motions for the nomination of the 14 departmental Select Committees. On 2 December, I moved motions relating to 13 of those Committees and they were approved by the House. The Committee of Selection has not yet invited the House to consider a similar motion in respect of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Patience is a virtue that will be rewarded shortly.

On 9 December the Committee agreed a short special report stating that we found ourselves unable to nominate a Scottish Affairs Select Committee which, in our opinion, would have the support of the House and, therefore, proposed to take no further action on the matter unless instructed by the House to do so. With the permission of the House, I shall explain briefly the background to that report and why the Committee is now seeking this debate.

In a series of meetings last autumn we considered, along with the many other items on our agenda, how best to set up the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. We accepted that there should be a Government majority on the Committee in accordance with the conventions of the House and with the fact that we are members of a unitary Parliament representing the whole of the United Kingdom. To achieve that, it was necessary to reduce the size of the Committee from 13 to nine and I understand that, through the usual channels, that was agreed. On 12 November the Committee's motion, with the names of the Conservative and minority party Members, was tabled. The Labour names were not ready at that stage but were added on 19 November. We thought that the resulting motion was a compromise with which both sides of the House could live.

However, the Committee received a letter from one of the hon. Members named in the motion — my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker)— saying that he was not willing to serve on the Committee. As Standing Order No. 104 requires the Committee of Selection to ascertain whether an hon. Member will give his attendance, we felt that we had no option but to amend our motion further to remove the hon. Gentleman's name. This left on the Order Paper a motion nominati eight hon. Members to the Select Committee on S Affairs. The options seemed to be having a Comm eight that did not reflect the Government's majorit House, which we recognised would not be in acco with the conventions and practices of the Hous Committee that included at least one hon. M representing an English constituency. We underst that time—there may have been developments s that the second option would not be acceptable principal Opposition party.

The Committee of Selection never discussed thi on the basis that it was not its role to make a ruli I made clear in a previous debate that embraced Select Committees, it is for each party to decide whic Members it will nominate.

By early December 1987 we had reached an im The Committee of Selection felt that any proposal mi[illegible]t put forward would prove unacceptable to o of [illegible] House or the other. It was against that backg that it made its special report. The report is not an a to block or prevent the setting up of a Select Com on Scottish Affairs. It is merely an acknowledgem real difficulties. The report is intended to leave all o open with a view to seeking further guidance fro House. The Committee of Selection will be delighted given guidance that will lead to the setting up of a Committee on Scottish Affairs with a composition will be broadly acceptable to the House.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): I am sur the House will be grateful to my hon. Friend the Me for Shipley (Sir M. Fox) for his outline of the Comm of Selection's consideration of this matter and for th in which the Committee tried to reach an agreed sol in what were clearly difficult and changing circumsta

As is so often the case in matters relating to the H the problem is not entirely new. Select Committee Scottish Affairs have presented special problem occasions in the past. A series of Sessional Scottish S Committees lapsed without exciting much comment i early 1970s, following some years of activity. No fu Committee was appointed for several years until despite the momentous Scottish issues before the H and the nation during that time. In 1979 the establish of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs followed time after that of the other departmental S Committees. I hope that in this case, too, we shall simi succeed in completing our Committee structure.

The deliberations of the Committee of Selection ar course, private. However, from what my hon. Friend Member for Shipley has said, and from the var motions which have appeared in his name on the O Paper, my understanding of the Committee's position follows. On 18 November 1987, the Committee Selection tabled a motion to set up a Select Comm which it believed would be generally acceptable and w it knew was in accordance with the traditions of the Ho Instead of the maximum 13 members, only nine w nominated. That enabled the Committee to reflect Government's majority in the House while compri only Members representing Scottish constituencies. Committee of Selection was then told by my hon. Fri the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) that he not prepared to serve on the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, and he was accordingly removed from the list of nominees. That left a motion to set up a Committee of only eight members, and a dilemma.

We have heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley the problem facing the Committee of Selection. It was required to take account of the refusal of my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North to serve, but a Select Committee of the eight other Members nominated would not have been in accordance with the conventions of the House because it would not reflect the Government's majority. Yet the Government's majority on the Committee could be achieved only by nominating a Committee which was not exclusively made up of Members representing Scottish constituencies, which the Committee of Selection believed would be unacceptable to the Opposition. It seems to have had good reason for that belief. The Opposition parties were represented on the Committee, and so were able to suggest or support a non-Scottish element as a way forward if that had been acceptable to them. There is also the fact that the Labour party did not nominate its members of the Committee until the week after it had seen the original motion nominating as the Conservative Members my five hon. Friends who sit on the Back Benches representing Scottish constituencies. The Committee of Selection therefore adjourned its consideration of the matter and reported to the House.

I accept, of course, that if my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North had felt able to serve on the Select Committee we might already have set it up. But he is within his rights to refuse, and indeed Standing Order No. 104 clearly implies that some Members will not wish to serve in this capacity. No doubt my hon. Friend may well seek to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, later in this debate.

I am sure it would be generally accepted that the responsibility for determining whether a Select Committee be appointed should not be left to one Member's personal decision whether he will serve. Nor need it be. In this unitary Parliament it is a principle that Members from all parts of the United Kingdom have an equal right to be heard. Likewise, all Members are equally eligible to be considered for membership of any Select Committee. If a party finds that it has more volunteers for a Select Committee than places available to it, some further form of selection is necessary. It is not surprising that in the past all members of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs have been Members for Scottish constituencies. But on this occasion the refusal of my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North to serve means that those of my hon. Friends who sit for constituencies outside Scotland and who are interested in serving on the Scottish Affairs Committee, as they are perfectly entitled to do, find their chances of being put forward greatly increased. I can see nothing wrong with that.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I do not know whether this is the right moment to raise this matter, but I am nervous about how long my right hon. Friend will continue. At the outset, my right hon. Friend said that there was no Scottish Affairs Select Committee between 1974 and 1979. Have I understood my right hon. Friend correctly?

Mr. Wakeham: That is absolutely right. I am trying to be as non-partisan as I can, but between 1974 and 1979 no Select Committee on Scottish Affairs was set up.

So far as the Opposition are concerned, whatever their earlier views, in their amendment to the motion I see welcome signs that they may be prepared to accept the principle that all hon. Members should be equally eligible to be considered for Select Committee nomination. If that is indeed the case, I look forward to hearing their more detailed proposals for constructive guidance to the Committee of Selection, and I hope that we may soon see the Select Committee established. I share their regret that it has not yet been possible to appoint it.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I am not as well versed in the etiquette of the House as the right hon. Gentleman and I genuinely hope that I am not transgressing in any way. I believe that he might agree that, whatever the Committee of Selection's interpretation, events have certainly moved on in terms of the exchange of views through the usual channels. I put it as broadly as that. It is clear that if the Government felt that they could man the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs by topping up with the introduction of perhaps one hon. Member who did not represent a Scottish constituency, the Opposition view was that that should be put to the House. There was a certain implication in that offer.

Mr. Wakeham: I understand the hon. Gentleman, and there is a difference between us. Our view is that in a unitary Parliament Members from either side of the House are entitled to serve on any Committee. I am not prepared to accept the proposition that that is what the hon. Gentleman has called "topping up". However, I am perfectly happy to listen to the debate.

I believe that the Opposition's amendment and their analysis of the failure to set up the Committee does not take proper account of the more complex questions of principle involved, particularly now that we have heard the account of my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley. Nor do I believe it to be a proper way forward simply to refer the question back to the Committee of Selection without clarifying the way in which we wish it to proceed in its consideration.

Although it has not been selected, I hope it will be in order to turn briefly to the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) and his colleagues in the Scottish National party. I recognise their particular interest in this, and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Angus, East for his courtesy in writing to my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary setting out his party's position on the membership of the Committee. I shall listen with great care to what he says tonight. But I have to say that I do not believe that the suggestion that the Committee of Selection should base its decisions on the general election result rather than the composition of the House is one that provides a generally acceptable way forward for further discussions.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): The proposition that those elected by the Scottish people who wish to serve on the Committee should be excluded because others who were elected by similar Scottish votes do not wish to serve is ludicrous. In place of the Scottish Members who are willing to serve on the Committee we are to have English Members, who do not have one Scottish vote to back them up, being dragged in to serve on the Committee. That is ludicrous and it goes against basic democratic rights.

Mr. Wakeham: On democratic rights, we are all elected as Members of the United Kingdom Parliament. By the conventions of the House and by any democratic arrangement the party with the largest number of seats in the House is entitled to a majority on the Committee. Therefore, it is not possible to meet the demands of the SNP and recognise the fundamental principle of the way that all Select Committees work. The Select Committee on Scottish Affairs is not a second-class Committee; it is as important a Select Committee as any other and should be formed in the same way.

This debate is an opportunity, which the Committee of Selection could not have when it made its special report, to hear the views of the House. I will listen to the debate for confirmation that both sides of the House endorse the principle of equal eligibility in a unitary Parliament which I mentioned earlier. Provided that this principle is accepted, I hope that we may find a common basis for continuing discussion about how we should proceed. The House can then return to this matter at an appropriate moment and give the Committee of Selection the clear guidance that it will require.

Mr Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the question and to add instead thereof:

'regrets the failure to establish a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs in view of the significant role it has to play in scrutinising the activities of the Scottish Office; recognises that the difficulties of the Committee of Selection are the direct result of the reluctance of Conservative honourable Members from Scotland to serve, and calls on them to reconsider their decision; notes the willingness of honourable Members from the other parts of the House to join the Committee and to seek a constructive solution to present difficulties; and, in the light of the above, instructs the Committee of Selection to nominate a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs.'

The present position is unsatisfactory and cannot be allowed to persist. It would be wrong for the Leader of the House to attempt to lay the blame for the failure of the House to establish a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs at the door of either the Committee of Selection or the Opposition. The fault lies with the Government, and the Leader of the House made that crystal clear this evening when he said that, on the basic principle that this is a unitary Parliament, the Government can appoint whom they like to represent them on the Committee. Why has he not got on with it and done that? If he had done that before Christmas we could have had the Committee in operation at the same time as the others.

I hope that neither the Leader of the House nor any of his hon. Friends will start pleading anything that happened before the departmental Select Committees were established as a precedent for not having a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. The fact is that departmental Committees were established by the House because it was believed by the House as a whole—this unitary Parliament — that there should be Select Committees monitoring every major Department of State, and the Scottish Office is a major Department of State.

The reason why the Committee was not established was that the Government could not, at that time, find enough Tories whom they regarded as suitable to serve on it. As we all know, that problem stems from the commendable good sense of the people of Scotland, who reduced the number of Tory Members of Parliament in Scotland to an unrepresentative rump of 10. We are now i position that almost twice as many Tory h who were born in Scotland represent seats in Wales as dared to stay in Scotland and leave fate to be decided by their compatriots. The that the place of birth of 32 Tory MPs is whatever that means—but of those whose p is recorded, no fewer than 17 hon. Members seats in England and Wales were born in Sc is understandable that ambitious Tories born leave their native land, because it clearly al their chances of being elected to the House.

With five Scottish Tories in the Governme five Back Benchers left to serve on the Select the Government's business managers were number of choices, which they could have exe time they liked. The Opposition, with 100 vot the Government, could do nothing to stop could have allowed the Select Committee Affairs to reflect the views of the people of S not have a Tory majority. At least that woul it easier for them, following the Committee ment, to dismiss its recommendations and co irrelevant and prejudiced against the Gove understand that the Government's busines considered that, but the Prime Minister coul the idea.

Conservative hon. Members, with childho public school, form the party of discipline, an have thought that they might—as another a have persuaded all five Tory Back Benchers serve on the Committee. I should have thought of them — including the hon. Member fo North (Mr. Walker) — had an obligatio constituents and to the people of Scotland discharge their duties in the House. It would the hon. Member for Tayside, North is going with a speech tonight, but he is not prepared to slogging on the Select Committee.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): The hon. should not continue too far in that vein. Has time in his parliamentary career, served on t Committees at the same time? I have.

Mr. Dobson: I have neither the hon. G vaulting ambition nor his towering intellect, a not seek to do so. I say that he has an obliga constituents and to the people of Scotland to div of his other interests and start representing th Select Committee.

The Government's other alternative—they power to do this—would have been to recru those English Tory Members from Scotland— footballing terms as the Anglos — to serv Committee. After all, some of them have bee participate in Scottish Question Time. Some Co Members are willing to clown about in the Cha not to do the heavy work in Committee. In ad

Mr. Rowe: I wonder whether the principles the hon. Gentleman has constructed his admira embrace the fact that his hon. Friend the M Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) has tabled day motion, signed by a large number of his Sco Friends, commenting on community care in Ke

Mr. Dobson: They have obviously accepted the principle enunciated by the Leader of the House that this is a unitary Parliament, and they are exercising the rights that ensue from that.

The other alternative was for the Government to follow the example of Glasgow Rangers and import for the Committee a few English Ministers who were actually born in England. However, that would probably have been entirely unacceptable to them.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): No Catholics.

Mr. Dobson: In deference to my hon. Friend, I can assure him that in researching where Tory Ministers were born I did not inquire into their religious beliefs. We all know what they are: they all worship Mammon.

The Government have the power to follow the principle enunciated by the Leader of the House, but they have not done any of the things that I have suggested. They have not established the Select Committee and are treating the people of Scotland with contempt by preventing proper scrutiny of the activities of the Scottish Office. That is why the Secretary of State for Scotland is so pleased that the Committee has not been established.

The Opposition recognise the importance of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs and think that, ideally, its membership should reflect the views of the people of Scotland, which were so overwhelmingly expressed at the general election. We also recognise force majeure in the shape of a Tory majority of 100. We do not expect ideal arrangements of any sort to be brought into operation. Therefore, all along we have sought to get the Committee established as soon as possible, and preferably with a wholly Scottish membership, but not necessarily if the Tory Whips cannot get all the Scottish Tory Members to do their duty.

What the Government are doing, or failing to do, is an insult to the people of Scotland, but it is also important for individual hon. Members, for the House and for people in the rest of the United Kingdom. If the Government get away with not establishing one departmental Select Committee, it will not be long before they try to get rid of another one because it is also inconvenient. Therefore, there is a basic principle at stake. Anybody who is interested in the scrutiny of the Executive will agree that this Committee must be established.

The Select Committee on Scottish Affairs has much work to do. The regional policy announcements made yesterday will clearly have an impact on Scotland and will need to be looked at. Yesterday the Secretary of State for Scotland, in response to a question by me, supplied me with a list. This is the list, and it weighs no less than 3¼ lb. It is a list of all those public appointments in Scotland for which he is responsible. I know that my right hon. and hon. Friends are keen to start scrutinising this list, if only to find out how many Tories have been appointed to these positions. They especially want to see how many ex-Tory Members of Parliament are getting on to the public payroll in Scotland, having denounced public expenditure until some of it was put in their pockets.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (Derbyshire, South): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the Labour party needs Select Committees to organise us?

Mr. Dobson: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman's parents hail from Northern Ireland or Scotland, but he ought to know that while it is possib individual hon. Members to do work, Select Comm have a special role to play.

I am sure that the Select Committee on Scottish A would be interested in all these public appointmen Scotland. However, there are far more important ma than public appointments to be considered and that the urgent attention of the Select Committee.

The Government should listen to this debate and the Committee of Selection. They should do their duty pick their team, however mixed its origins or ability. of the problems is that they know in their heart of h that, whatever team they pick, Labour's Scottish team play them off the park.

11.30 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The nothing to be gained from labouring the point, but political reality in Scotland following the last electio that the Government party is in a substantial mino Scotland has 50 Labour Members, 10 Conserva Members, nine alliance Members and three Sco National party Members.

Mr. Wilson: Is that the auld alliance?

Mr. Wallace: It was those who fought the gen election under the manifesto "Britain United". composition of the Scottish Affairs Select Comm should reflect the number of Scottish seats held in House by the various political parties.

In July last year, after the election, my hon. Friends I tabled early-day motion 87, which proposed that composition of the Select Committee should be Labour Members, three Conservative Members, alliance Members and one Scottish National p Member. If anything, that was a little generous to Conservative party, given that it had only one more than the combined forces of the alliance.

Nevertheless, as the hon. Member for Holborn and Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said, we recognise force maje If the Government do not wish to have an Opposit majority, they have the majority in the House to vot down. It is perfectly clear that a Committee withou Government majority would not be accepted. One understand why the Government do not want Committee with an Opposition majority, because Committee would have the power to summon Minis every fortnight, or even more regularly, and lambast th with the policies currently afflicting Scotland.

There is something to be said for a Committee with Opposition majority, although the Scottish public wo find it tedious if Government Ministers were consta hauled over the coals before the Committee. The pu would expect a Committee, particularly one with Opposition majority, to be more responsible and to h a probing role into the affairs of the Scottish Office.

The Government have had difficulty in getting Committee with a majority of their Members. The h Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) has declined serve and there is an indication that the hon. and learn Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) unwilling to serve, as is the hon. Member for Eastwo (Mr. Stewart). I see that the Member for Eastwood nodding assent. Undoubtedly those hon. Members ha the right under the Standing Orders to decline to serve, b hon. Members should not claim only rights; they also have responsibilities. The Back-Bench Members of a Government who have so few Scottish Members, but who nevertheless claim to have a mandate to govern Scotland, have a duty to bear some responsibility and be prepared to take part in the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, if that is the cost of setting up the Committee.

The Committee of Selection, on which I serve as the representative of the minority parties, when it was clear that the Government would not have a majority of Scottish Members, suggested that it was still possible to get a Committee of four Conservative Members, three Labour Members, one Liberal Member and one Scottish National party Member. I accept the point made by the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) that it is unfair that the Scottish National party has Members who are anxious to serve but are denied the right to do so, when Conservative Members for Scottish seats have declined to serve.

The other possibility was that the Government could supplement its numbers from English Members. The hon. Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox) said that no proposal was put before the Committee of Selection that included the name of any hon. Member for an English constituency.

I tried to follow the exchanges. Using a football analogy, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras suggested that the Labour party would be prepared to accept an hon. Member for an English constituency—preferably an hon. Member with Scottish origins. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Then perhaps it is any hon. Member for an English seat. [HON. MEMBERS: "Any will do."] The Opposition do not intend to be racist about it. An hon. Member for a Welsh seat would be acceptable. I hope that the Leader of the House has noted that suggestion.

Mr. Dewar: May I make it abundantly clear that we believe that by far the best solution would be if the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs could be constituted along traditional lines, with Scottish Members of Parliament serving on it. There are a number of ways in which that could be done. Given the Government's view of the matter, the only way in which the Committee is likely to be set up is if we are prepared to adopt a more flexible view. It would be better to have a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs than to have no Committee. We should expect a solid contribution from Scottish Members of Parliament on the Government side, but if the only way in which the Committee can be saved is by some form of dilution—we do not seek to dictate to the Government who should serve on the Committee; it would be neither proper nor constructive to do so — we should be prepared to pay that price.

Mr. Wallace: The whole House is indebted to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) for setting out the position so clearly. No hon. Member can be in any doubt now about the position.

Among a number of other issues that we have considered during the course of a rather busy day, we have agonised over whether it would be better to have no Committee at all rather than a Committee that included hon. Members from south of the border. We have come, regretfully, to the same conclusion as the hon. Member for Garscadden: that it would be far better to have a Committee than to have no Committee at all.

A Committee that was bound to di party political lines would make contribution, but hon. Members from Sc cies would be able to identify a large nu and issues that affect Scotland that nee divide the Committee along party po example, the state of Scottish prisons, w since the setting up of the Scottish legal months ago and the clash between enviro and industrial interests. If the Committ constructively, it could make an importa the government of Scotland and also to t the United Kingdom as a whole.

My right hon. and hon. Friends agre Opposition's view, and I hope that th House will be able to respond construct been said from this side of the House.

11.38 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): C days, I find it rich that a Liberal spokes to Conservative Members about re working together. Really!

I welcome the opportunity to speal because I am thereby given the means of the reasons why I am not prepared to se of the Scottish Affairs Committee. I hav decision lightly, and it is not a decision th at overnight. I should also explain that only one letter on this matter while it discussion. I hope that by detailing my demolish the bogus allegations that have my position and motives.

Mr. Dewar: I am sure that the hon. a factual comment about his mailbag. Ho not give the impression to those hon. M who may not be so familiar with the Sc there is no concern in Scotland about Scottish Affairs Select Committee. There and it is reflected in every quarter. Is th of that in the fact that the Scottish C Unionist Association expressed its disqui the attitude taken by the hon. Member fo (Mr. Walker)?

Mr. Walker: Actually, that was the o received.

As I said earlier, I hope, by detailing demolish the bogus allegations that have b my position and motives. At the same tim dispel the myths that have been spread b of the Scottish media. I cite for example in the Glasgow Herald. It states:

"Some Scottish Conservative Back Benc small residue who have not been pressed service have shown hostility to the idea of the Scottish Affairs Committee—

"as lobby fodder"—

and that is the important phrase. What n

Every hon. Member knows that Select Back-Bench Committees. They are Committees and they do not create legis not have Ministers and Whips and, u Committees, they do not contain Members fodder. Select Committees consist of Me Opposition or the Government; they fodder. Those Select Committees that have been seen to be effective are those in which Back-Bench Members have not been Lobby fodder. In those Committees, Members have submerged party loyalty in the interests of being good and effective House of Commons men and women and good Select Committee members.

I have had the good fortune to serve on two such Select Committees, one of which—the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration—was chaired by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Sir A. Buck). I served on that Select Committee in two Parliaments and I hope that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) is aware of that. That Select Committee is a splendid example of an effective House of Commons Select Committee. In it partisan loyalty is given second place to Committee loyalty and it has achieved much good work and has presented good reports to Parliament. The result is that the Committee is respected by those it interviews and, more importantly, the Government take the Committee's recommendations seriously. They have led to changes in the law and to changes and improvements in the management of Government Departments and Health Service administration. That is as effective a Select Committee as the House could wish to see.

Sadly, I have to advise the House that the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs fell far below the standards of the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration. The result was that Committee members were often unhappy with its conduct. On three occasions during the previous two Parliaments I was obliged to move what were effectively votes of no confidence in the Chair or in the conduct of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs.

I was deeply saddened by that, because I believed genuinely that it would be possible to have high investigative standards similar to those achieved in the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration. I was doubly saddened because I had volunteered to serve on the Select Committee. As a convinced supporter of a unitary Parliament, I wanted Scottish matters to be handled in a modern, sympathetic and realistic manner. But however hard we tried, and however energetically I and others worked on the inquiries, often reading complex evidence that had been presented to the Committee, I became convinced that the Committee was a misuse of scarce and valuable parliamentary time.

The crunch came with the inquiry into Gartcosh. It soon became evident that members had not read the evidence submitted, or that they did not understand the evidence submitted, or that they had already decided what the Committee's report would say, regardless of the evidence that was presented. This culminated in my speaking to the first amendment to the Chairman's first draft report. Everyone knows that there is no time limit on speeches in Select Committees. The objective of my speech was to insert some flexibility into the draft report so that it would reflect more accurately the evidence that had been submitted to the Committee. I am pleased to tell the House that, after I had been speaking for a considerable time, a colleague of mine was able to negotiate changes to the report.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman is trying to tell us that the Select Committee would work much better if he were a member of it, but is it not true that, in the inquiry, it was a question not of Conservative being at odds with Opposition Members, but of Gentleman being at odds with other membe Conservative group?

Mr. Walker: Sadly, I must admit the truth shall tell the hon. Gentleman and the House wh that my record of opposing skullduggery, from it comes, is known to the House. When a Com presented with evidence, and that evidence co [HON. MEMBERS: "You."] I know exactly contained: profit and loss accounts, cash accou

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): On order, Mr. Speaker. Time is limited in this debate like intervening in any hon. Member's speech, bu an obligation to give some instructions and guida Committee of Selection, and I wonder whether t of the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. W helping us in that regard.

Mr. Speaker: Every hon. Member m responsibility for his own speech. I think that Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) was by a question that was put to him. I hope tha return to the main topic.

Mr. Walker: I had not intended to go into this If hon. Members wish to have the details of that they should read the evidence that was reporte House. All that I will say is that an attempt w deliberately to mislead the Committee, and I wou a party to it.

The result of all this was that the Committee longer command the respect of Ministers. Cons I felt—in this I am at one with Liberal Membe it was time that I left the Committee, and I wro Chairman of the Committee of Selection at th arrived at my decision not as a result of the genera of 1987, but because I was unhappy with the co the business of the Scottish Affairs Select Co Hon. Members who were members of that Co and who honestly believe in their hearts that we c should have done a good job for Scotland, would pressed to say that we were doing that. We were hours and hours indulging in what were ofte party-political battles.

I also find it offensive that snide remarks ha made—even, on occasion, from the Oppositio Bench—suggesting that my attitude has somethi with the fact that I am not sitting on the Treasur Anyone who cares to study my history will fin arrived in the House very seriously injured: it is su that I was able to stand at all. Moreover, anyone w to study the position that I have taken on Scottish will know that I have always intended to be inde and constructive. That is hardly the recipe for clim greasy pole of preferment, but I chose that deliberately, as I have done this evening.

I also find it rich that the Scottish Nation should be telling us how much it cares about the Affairs Committee, when everyone knows that in two Parliaments Gordon Wilson and Donald refused to serve on it. Anyone who cares to investi find that some interesting comments were made by both gentlemen, none of which was in favour of the Committee. Indeed, they all opposed it.

In the light of what I have said, and the sad history of the Scottish Affairs Committee, I feel that the House would be well advised to take note of what the Committee of Selection has told it this evening. Hon. Members should remember that, if we are to make such Committees work, we cannot do so on the purely partisan lines that have been followed in the Scottish Affairs Committee in the last two or three Parliaments.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): If anything is an advertisement for Scottish self-government, I think that these proceedings are such an advertisement. If nothing else, it would at least relieve English Members of this kind of conduct.

I note that the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) is opposed to the Scottish Affairs Select Committee, not because he failed that Committee, but because it failed to reach his high standards. Bearing that in mind, my sympathies are entirely with those who served on the Committee with him. The hon. Gentleman is the most Unionist of Conservative Members, and he of all people should be taking part in what is a British institution of the House. It is disgraceful that he has held up our proceedings in such a fashion. He should be volunteering to serve.

This is very much the late-late show: it is rather knockabout stuff. I find it a disgraceful way to treat a very serious matter which concerns the government of Scotland. It is not so much a debate as some kind of punishment that we are all asked to undergo. As midnight approaches, I find it very difficult to explain to the Scottish people exactly how the House conducts its business and considers the government of our country at this late hour and in such a cursory fashion.

At the end of this so-called debate, reality will set in, because to the vote will be added the mass of English Tory Members who will make the final decision. It is a harsh system. When we come to a vote, the English majority will arrive and decide what happens, and the Scots will have to go along with it. People playing for Rangers nowadays must experience a rather similar feeling. But that is the principle of English Tory Members deciding what goes on in Scotland. That principle was enunciated very clearly by the Leader of the House. It should be unacceptable to Scots.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will the hon. Gentleman tell me how it is different when Scottish Members are willing to vote on Sunday trading in England and Wales and impose on England and Wales conditions that do not apply in Scotland, and to vote on the abolition of the Greater London council, which could scarcely be described as a Scottish issue?

Mr. Welsh: The hon. Member is asking the wrong person. I would not have taken part in those decisions. We do not expect to run England, and we would rather not have England run our affairs.

This is a coroner's hearing. I choose an English procedure, because that is how the House is run. It is a coroner's hearing without the corpse, which disappeared with the previous Parliament. Unle themselves organised, that will be of the Scottish Affairs Select Com not be good enough.

This is not a debate, because we Government will decide through t saying that the matter will be sen Selection, for the Government w majority there. This is no way in v business, especially on a take not device—which is designed to put into limbo, which is what the Gov

We are discussing fundamental are considering the right of hon. Ministers and bring them to accou in my party, among all Opposition Conservative Back Benchers about treated by the Government, who rights. The Select Committees are t happened recently as they have give some rights.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, listening carefully to the hon. Gent put the matter into historical perspe House to explain why, if his party so seriously and gives it the true pe given it, his former colleagues— Stewart — steadfastly refused to Committee.

Mr. Welsh: My colleagues are w Committee because we believe it more, no less. The Labour party's First, it did not want any English M accept some English Members, and English Members.

We are here because Labou Conservatives' game. The Governm Select Committee. They have been the Opposition along. The Governm of wilting lillies. Mr. Welsh: Not yet.

Mr. Welsh: The Scottish Select C important, because Scots Back Bench once in five weeks to tackle the Secret questions, which have been tabled a fortnight before. He holds nine portfolios which in England have separate Ministers and separate days for oral questions. How can Scots Back Benchers scrutinise the Government properly if they do not have the Select Committee?

I ask the Government, as it is they who will eventually decide, to get on with this matter. Scotland needs the Committee. It needs a means of holding the Government accountable to the House. The Government should stop this nonsense and get the Committee going so that we can scrutinise what they are doing in our country.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): My right hon. Friend the Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons has spelt out the position to the House fully and very fairly. It is my view that Select Committees can do an extremely valuable job, but they do it when hon. Members join in independent, non-partisan and reasoned examination of issues and policies pursued by the Executive. My position, as perfectly accurately stated to the House by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), is that setting up the Scottish Select Committee in this Parliament would, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be a complete waste of time.

My name is on the Order Paper for a number of reasons, the main one being that, not having the expertise of my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), I did not realise that I could be taken off by the simple expedient of writing to my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox). In the absence of assurances to the contrary, I do not believe for a single moment that there would be any real prospect of the Labour Members of such a Committee behaving in a reasoned, constructive manner, in accordance with the traditions of the House.

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden) rose——

Mr. Stewart: In relation to my own constituency, I can only tell the House that if my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North has received one letter, that is one more than I have received. Everyone in the constituency of Eastwood to whom I have spoken has supported my position that good constituency Members should not waste their time.

The basic reason why the Select Committee has not yet been set up is not the objections of my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North, but the failure, at least until tonight, of the Labour party to accept the unitary principle. We were told by hon. Members again and again that it was unacceptable to have English Members on the Scottish Select Committee.

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) is saying that he was privy to information to which no other hon. Members were privy. How did he get this information?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Allan Stewart.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to Hansard. It was stated by hon. Members that having English Members on the Committee was unacceptable. To take one example, the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), a luminary of the Scottish Labour party, certainly said that in answer to a question

That principle of the unitary Parliamen accepted by Scottish Labour Members or other occasions. Only this week the hon. M Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) said tha intolerable if English Members were Committee to consider the Housing (Scotla the same time a Scottish Labour Member h on a Committee to consider a Bill affecting and Welsh matters, the Licensing Bill, and the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moo a valuable contribution to the debates on th you will recall, Mr. Speaker, Labour Memb House after the first Scottish Question Parliament because they believed that it was hon. Friends from English seats to seek to during Scottish questions.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Gar Dewar) does not accept the unitary principl the official business of the House, because this Session he announced the Scottish Labo —doubtless to ringing cries about the "m Scottish people, comrades" — that the L would not discuss business matters with m the Member for Penrith and The Border (solely because his constituency happened wrong side of Gretna Green.

I believe that the attitude that has con taken on the unitary principle by the Labou Parliament is reprehensible and wrong. If it a result of the focusing of minds by this iss House tonight, it will be a positive gain. I House will support the motion moved by r Friend. If there is to be any progress, I hope on a reasoned basis. Certainly no assuranc received as yet on that from the Labour pa

12.4 am

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I listen Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) when him on television that he should serve Committee on Scottish Affairs. That eveni put forward any of the reasons that he has House in expressing reservations abo Committee on Scottish Affairs. His reason t rather pompous — that he was now a Bencher and no Patronage Secretary could to do. The purpose of my raising that at th point out the fact that the hon. Member North (Mr. Walker)—what a narrow esca Committee on Scottish Affairs had — a Member for Eastwood shifted their position that they would want a Scottish Affairs Sele provided there were English Tory Back Ben saying that they do not want a Scottish A Committee in any circumstances. If the deb nothing else, it has brought out the true reas hon. Member for Eastwood's obstruction Committee and the hon. Member for Tayside wanting to serve at all.

The Leader of the House was less than fair there had been no Select Committee on Sc between 1974 and 1979. That is true, but t knowledge when the Conservatives were i between 1974 and 1979 there was no requ Opposition for a Select Committee to be e any subject.

[Mr. Harry Ewing]

The Leader of the House should know that in those days the nature and purpose of Select Committees were totally different from the nature and purpose of the Select Committee we are discussing tonight. The last Select Committee under the old arrangement was chaired by John Brewis, the predecessor but one of the Minister of State, Scottish Office. That Select Committee was set up to consider land use in Scotland. The Tory Opposition in Scotland between 1974 and 1979 did not raise one subject that they thought was worthy of examination by such a Select Committee.

The position now is different. As the whole House knows, we are talking about departmental Select Committees set up to examine Ministers and civil servants and the functions that they carry out. They are totally different. They were established by Norman St. John Stevas. The Leader of the House was less than forthcoming in that part of his speech.

The hon. Member for Eastwood wants an assurance from the Opposition that we accept that this is a unitary Parliament. I give an absolute assurance that I accept that this is a unitary Parliament. I will go further. I predict that if we get much more of the carry-on that we have had from the Tory party tonight, it will not be a unitary Parliament much longer. The one sure way to let the SNP, which is even less of a rump than the Tory party in Scotland, get its way in Scotland is to conduct these debates in the way in which the Leader of the House, the hon. Member for Tayside, North and the hon. Member for Eastwood have conducted the debate tonight.

It ill becomes the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) to lecture anyone in any part of the House about English Members dictating to people. He is the provost of Angus district council, but not once has he had the courage or the guts to defy the Secretary of State for Scotland on rent increases——

Mr. Andrew Welsh rose——

Mr. Ewing: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman when I have finished with him. The hon. Gentleman criticises the Labour party and Labour councils. When the Secretary of State told him to put rents up, he asked, "How much do you want us to put them up?" When he was told to spend within spending guidelines, his answer was, "That's all right, Malcolm; I'll do that as well." We do not want any rubbish from the hon. Member for Angus, East lecturing us about being dictated to by English Members.

Mr. Andrew Welsh: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should listen to the lectures because he has chosen the wrong issue. Under my control Angus district council had the lowest rents increase in a decade and record spending on behalf of its council tenants. We have lower combined rents and rates than any Labour council, except one, and at one time that council was SNP controlled. If the hon. Gentleman gave his tenants the same good deal as Angus district council has given its tenants under SNP control, they would be much better off today.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We should not go too far down that line. Let us get back to the debate.

Mr. Ewing: That is part of the debate. I am not going to allow the Scottish Tories to dictate the position in Scotland, and I am certainly not going to allow three SNP Members to dictate to the Labour party in Scotland. It is time someone told them that they do not have much of a representation in Scotland. It is time someone told them about the record of their predecessors in the previous Parliament. We will not take lectures from the SNP.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ewing: I gave way to the deputy leader of the SNP, but I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Presumably the hon. Gentleman comes from part of the same clan as myself in view of our surnames. May I ask him directly whether it is his view that a party that contested the general election as a democratic party should be denied the right to have a seat on the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs?

Mr. Ewing: I am not particularly interested as to whether the SNP is represented on the Select Committee. I am saying that I will not be dictated to by three hon. Members who just scraped in here by the skin of their teeth. When the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) was a Member of the House previously, she voted with the Tory party—[Interruption.] The SNP does not have a very good record. The hon. Lady mentioned the similarity in our names. I do not blame her for changing her name since she was here last.

There are far too many important issues that the Scottish Office wants to sweep under the carpet. It is far better to set up a Select Committee in order to consider and investigate those matters than to go down the narrow road advocated by the SNP and the hon. Members for Eastwood and for Tayside, North and not have a Committee at all. The Chairman of the Committee of Selection said that he was here to listen and would accept guidance. The Leader of the House is under an obligation, having heard the guidance, to come forward within the next week or 10 days with a motion on the Order Paper to set up the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs and let it get to work.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I will not get involved in the inter-party squabbles on the Opposition Benches. If the people of Scotland could see that rabble tonight operating in Edinburgh, they would say, "Heaven help us from ever having devolution."

One interesting point raised tonight was that the Chairman of the Committee of Selection has to ascertain one's wish to attend the Select Committee. I am sure that if some of us had known that years before, the situation might be very different.

The Opposition's amendment is factually incorrect when it asserts that Conservative Members are reluctant to serve on the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. Two or more of us were not reluctant and would have been prepared to serve upon it had it been set up. That is still the position.

The Opposition have tried to present themselves as whiter than white in the handling of this issue through the usual channels since the general election. It should not be forgotten that early in November the Labour Opposition had submitted no names to the Committee of Selection. Perhaps that is a reflection of their internal problems. We were then introduced to an impasse. In these instances we live by rumour—that is often the way of the House—because no minutes are produced to reflect the discussions of various party committees. At this stage the Labour Opposition were anxious to dictate which Conservative Member should be selected to serve on the Select Committee. That was considered by the House to be intolerable and unacceptable. That was certainly the view of Conservative Members.

This evening the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) has become flexible in an effort to retrieve some credibility following the behaviour of the Labour party over the past two months. I heard no mention of flexibility during November or December. During that period the Labour Opposition were determined to have the Members who they chose to serve on the Select Committee and not the Members selected by the Committee of Selection. Now the Opposition are claiming that they wanted from the start to see the setting up of the Select Committee. They claim now always to have been flexible and always prepared to listen to reason, but that was not their position during November and December. It was during that period that they lost the right to see the establishment of the Committee. The requirements that they were dictating to the Committee of Selection were unacceptable to that Committee, and they would have been shown to be unacceptable to the House had a motion reflecting them been put before the House.

Mr. Douglas: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Hector Monro: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman because there is a shortage of time. The hon. Gentleman has intervened once already in another hon. Member's speech.

It is the duty of the House to support the Chairman of the Committee of Selection, my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox), and his motion and to reject the Opposition's bogus amendment, which is factually incorrect and unacceptable.

12.18 am

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): I shall not bore the House by recounting my activities, or lack of them, during the period that I served as a member of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. I merely say that if there is a right for any Select Committee to be established in this place, that right must embrace the setting up of a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. We must bear in mind the extensive powers of the Secretary of State for Scotland and the activities of the Scottish Office in acting on his behalf. It would be a scandal if the representatives of the people of Scotland were denied the right to survey the Government's activities in Scotland. That would lead to increased frustration on the Opposition Benches, especially among my right hon. and hon. Friends who represent Scottish constituencies. The people of Scotland see it as their right that there should be established a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs to proceed with any investigations that it sees fit to initiate.

Previous Select Committees on Scottish Affairs, irrespective of whether Members enjoyed serving on them, undertook some valuable work. Many comments to that effect have been made by the spokesmen of both Front Benches.

The frustration of the people of Scotland is growing. Perhaps they are not writing to tell us that they want to see the establishment of a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, but it cannot be denied that when the previous Committee went about its business in Scotland there was keen local interest in what was taking place. There was press coverage of the discussions that took place on many of the important issues that involved the lives of the people of Scotland.

I will conclude by quoting two sentences from an editorial in the Glasgow Herald. One refers to "Scotland, a partner of the United Kingdom and not simply a UK region."

Hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber must understand that. They must also appreciate that, at the moment, Scotland is a willing partner, but that may not always be the case. It may not necessarily be the SNP who will convey that message from the Scottish people. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] The Scottish people will determine whether they will remain a willing partner. The scandalous and outrageous way in which the people are treated by the Government may determine them to change their minds in the coming years. That will occur unless the Government recognise the needs and the rights of the Scottish people.

A further sentence from the Glasgow Herald editorial gives a marvellous analogy of the situation:

"The rocky outcrop of Tantallon Castle, historical centre of English influence in Scotland, dominates the wild east Lothian coast; so too does Thatcherism dominate Scottish politics".

That castle now stands in ruins and Thatcherism, the large rock that juts out in Scottish politics, dominates a people who rejected it. Unless the rights of those people are recognised, frustration will grow into a tide that will overwhelm the desire, shared by all of us, for a united kingdom.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): We have listened carefully to some lively debate, but we are discussing a serious issue. I know from contacts on the Government Benches that they also consider this a serious matter, and I give credit for that.

I have not enjoyed all the speeches. I listened carefully to the speech of the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart). In private he is the most amiable of men, but I must tell him that I find him less and less pleasant as a public figure. I served as Chairman of the Scottish Affairs Select Committee when it was reconstituted in 1979 and I find it curious—I use a neutral word—that the hon. Gentleman should object to partisan conduct in Select Committees. I remember his role and that of other Conservative Members during the Committee's investigation into the the SDA's attempts to attract industry to Scotland. That is just one example. I am sorry—I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts that my sorrow is genuine—that he has joined the refuseniks on this issue. He does not do himself justice.

I accept the important point that the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) did not enjoy his days on the Committee. He was an embattled minority of one, cut off from his own side. I accept that that must have been an unpleasant experience, although one with which perhaps, on occasions, he has had to live. However, there is no case for saying that we should not have a Select Committee because in the past one or two hon. Members—rightly or wrongly — have not enjoyed their service on a Committee. If we proceeded on that basis, we would abolish a Select Committee on any subject if it had a bad run. The Select Committees would represent a diminishing part of the parliamentary scene.

The hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) has had long experience of the ways of the House. I do not believe that it was fair to say that we tried to dictate, at any point, who should be on the Committee. I am not aware of any such effort. I do not believe that the hon. Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox) gave the impression that he felt that Labour Members had dictated to him. Indeed, he fairly said that the matter had not been discussed by the Committee of Selection because it felt that it was a matter for the business managers on both sides as to who should serve on the Scottish Affairs Select Committee. The claims by the hon. Member for Dumfries are the stuff of myths and represent specious special pleading that does not give credit to the debate.

The Select Committee on Scottish Affairs is important because it is part of the parliamentary process. It would be a better irony if the Scottish Office were the one major Department of State that was not subject to the scrutiny of a Select Committee. We and the majority of the Scottish people believe that the Government's policies for Scotland are insensitive and inappropriate. It is essential that the Ministers responsible should be called to account by a Select Committee.

Once more I must make it clear that our overriding concern is that the Select Committee should be established. I have explained that our preference would be for a Committee made up of Members representing Scottish seats. That could be achieved if Scottish Tory Members were prepared to serve or by increasing the number of Scottish Members from other parties. There will be no shortage of volunteers from the Scottish Labour group if that route is to be followed. Sadly—and I must accept this as a practical politician—it appears that the Government are insisting on a Conservative majority, but they cannot deliver the numbers required to achieve that from the Scottish Conservative ranks.

We could allow ourselves the luxury, which the SNP is taking, of saying that it must be a Select Committee and it must comprise only Scottish Members. But in the real world of the present that is impossible. In effect, it is to say that there will not be a Select Committee and we have rejected that.

Mr. Salmond: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dewar: No. I am anxious that the Leader of the House should have a chance to respond, so I have only a couple of minutes at most.

If the Scottish Conservative ranks will not deliver sufficient hon. Members, the future of the Select Committee is at risk as a direct result. Given the difficulties in the Conservative camp, Labour has taken a constructive approach. We argue that the Government have a duty to set up the Committee. If, in addition to the Scottish Tory Members who are prepared to serve, that involves nominating Members from other parts of the United Kingdom, the House should be given the opportunity to take that decision. We would consider any such solution an eloquent condemnation and comment on the Government's weakness in Scotland. But our preference is and must be for a Select Committee in being and working rather than for no Select Committee.

If the only way to set up the Select Committee i include a minimum of hon. Members representing Eng constituencies, Labour will accept reluctantly that price must be paid. We hope that the reluctant Scot Tory Members will reconsider their position as, indee remind the hon. Member for Tayside, North, the Scot Conservative and Unionist Association has urged him. however, there is no movement, the Government hav duty to respond to the clear wish of Scottish public political opinion that a way forward be found.

The hon. Member for Shipley made it clear that he seeking the advice of the House and the views of the par within it. I hope that I have made the position of my ri hon. and hon. Friends clear. Who should be nominate a matter for the business managers. In view of what I h said, I do not believe that there is any virtue in semant about our constitutional structure, behind which Leader of the House appeared, at least momentarily, shelter. He knows our view. I hope that he will now prepared to act on it and find enough Tory Members w believe in the Select Committee system and in the need have comprehensive coverage and scrutiny of Scotti affairs to ensure that we make progress shortly.

12.27 am

Mr. Wakeham: It has been a noisy and good-humour debate. I have listened carefully to the Opposition a important issues underlie these matters. Some of t comments of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadd (Mr. Dewar) were more encouraging and flexible tha earlier comments, but they were certainly inconsistent wi what my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fo said and what was said by Opposition Members in t Committee of Selection. They were even more inconsiste with the Opposition amendment on the Order Paper. Eac position is different, none is consistent one with the othe Therefore, I believe that we are right to take note of th special report and to reject the amendment in the nam of Opposition Members.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): The speec from the Leader of the House is regrettable. He doe nothing to enhance his reputation by his economy with th truth, which might earn him a peerage but certainly wil not earn him the respect of Labour Members.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said specifically that there wa no conflict between what he was saying and what the hon Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox) said, as far as I could see the hon. Gentleman agreed with those sentiments. Yet the Leader of the House has contradicted the hon. Gentleman. There is a need for clarification. There can be no doubt on this issue. There is only one black and white issue: of 370 Members who sit on the other side, the Government cannot find five to serve on this Committee——

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the amendment be made:—

Resolved,

That this House takes note of the Special Report from the Committee of Selection of 9th December, relating to the Scottish Affairs Committee.

Firbeck Hospital

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

12.52 am

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I am pleased that I have been granted this Adjournment debate tonight to bring to the attention of the House the closure of Firbeck hospital in my constituency. Firbeck hall was bought by the Miners Welfare Commission in December 1945 after being used during the second world war by the Sheffield hospitals board. It was converted into a rehabilitation centre with accommodation for 50 patients, and the first cases were received in April 1947. By 1950 the capacity had been increased to 95 beds through the building of a new wing comprising a gymnasium, hydrotherapy pool, treatment rooms and workshops.

The centre was transferred to the Ministry of Health in 1952 and it was agreed that it would have its own management committee within the NHS, but by virtue of the National Health Service Reorganisation Act 1973 the committee was abolished and the centre came under the control of the Rotherham area health authority in 1974. It has kept a Firbeck hospital committee, with members from neighbouring health authorities, British Coal, Rotherham community health council and coal mining trade unions. It has changed its views to treat many patients from all walks of life, including amputees, who are referred to it from the artificial limb and appliance centre at Sheffield. Those patients have been allocated beds where concentrated courses of treatment and care take place.

On 12 November 1987 the Rotherham health authority agreed to circulate a formal consultation document and an option appraisal on the rehabilitation services in Rotherham. According to that document, the authority believes that the closure of Firbeck hospital is justified. I disagree with that decision. The option appraisal identified three possible choices: to upgrade Firbeck hospital; to provide rehabilitation services at Badsley Moor lane hospital; and to provide such services at the district general hospital at Rotherham. The authority decided to favour the second option, and then sent the matter out for consultation. The consultation document mentions the number of miners who have been treated during the past decade and the changes in attendance, which have meant that "the number of patients treated has increased over recent years, particularly in the day and sessional out-patients categories."

The document says that more patients could use the hospital, including those who are not receiving treatment because of their inability or unwillingness to make the long journey to Firbeck. That caused me to smile, because I have with me the minutes of a meeting held in August 1945 of the local trade union associations and the Miners Welfare Commission, when it was decided to purchase Firbeck. Mr. A. Nicholl, the community surgeon to the commission, stated that a centre should not be more than 25 or 30 miles from patients' homes. I assure the House that private and public travel facilities have improved a great deal since 1945, when the historic decision to buy the hospital was made.

The penultimate paragraph of the consultation document states:

[Mr. Kevin Barron]

"Having considered the option appraisal, and recognising the need to provide services effectively and in the most efficient manner, the Authority believes closure of Firbeck Hospital is justified because the service can be provided more effectively elsewhere to a wider range of patients. Significant revenue savings can be achieved which will be available for other service developments."

Let me deal with those two assertions: first, that money will be saved. That is the case on revenue costs, but not on capital costs. Indeed, the other two options would have a much higher capital cost. The actual difference when capital costs are taken into account is small when compared with the area health authority budget. We must offset that small cost against the treatment and care the hospital can provide now and in the future.

The hospital has helped many thousands of miners to get back into work after serious injury. My father and brother have had in-patient treatment at the hospital following industrial accidents. The health problems of mineworkers are different from those of the general population, and the requirement for orthopaedic-related services is much greater. About 45 per cent. of disabilities in the mining industry are in the trauma of musculo-skeletal categories.

In a report written in 1983, Mr. E. B. Macdonald, then the National Coal Board's principal medical officer for Yorkshire, who is an honorary consultant in rehabilitation and rheumatology, said:

"Medicine in the United Kingdom is primarily orientated towards acute treatment rather than prevention and rehabilitation. Rehabilitation has always been recognised as the 'Cinderella' among the medical specialties. Furthermore, treatment services have evolved such that they tend to be centralised around large district general hospitals which are designed to provide most facilities necessary for the majority in the community . . . Prolonged unnecessary absence from work takes its toll psychologically. It is well recognised in sociological studies that after as little as three months off work a man or woman can lose their drive and volition to work. This in itself makes the rehabilitation process more difficult because of these and other psychological effects. These patients do not respond well to short sessions of treatment in hospital outpatient departments in between which they lapse back into the apathy of the sit-at-home, visit-the-club routine. These patients tend to make very good progress at Firbeck . . . I believe that it is important for men and women working in heavy industry to get prompt and effective treatment for their disability, not only for their own benefit but for the good of the community as their unnecessary absence from work has enormous economic effects."

Mr. Macdonald believed that Firbeck should be fully integrated into the National Health Service as part of the continuing rehabilitation process. That is evidence from a leading expert who is recognised in south Yorkshire and in most other areas.

The hospital was previously under scrutiny in 1983-84, in the Trent regional review. Rotherham community health council visited the hospital in August 1984, and I can summarise its report as follows:

"'Small is beautiful' and small organisations can cater more for a specific person. Firbeck develops competition between patients. Patients may lose their identity and become 'lost' in a large unit . . . The setting at Firbeck is ideal and inspires patients to communicate with nature. Firbeck should be developed to a greater extent . . . Firbeck provides a very valuable service to the local heavy industries and encourages patients to get themselves fit for work . . . As opposed to a District General Hospital environment Firbeck has the time and facilities to concentrate on cybernetics and the human involvement."

The neighbouring Bassetlaw community heal also visited the hospital in October 1984, and in its report:

"There is no hesitation whatsoever in recommer Firbeck Rehabilitation Centre be continued ar expanded as members are convinced, after h opportunity of talking to both patients and staff, th and facilities provided at Firbeck could not be equ DGS site."

When visiting Firbeck, I spoke to a person wh both his lower limbs in an industrial accident. T certainly no doubt in my mind that the treatment that he was receiving was going a long way rehabilitating him to the realities that a young m such traumatic injuries must face. I recall that h same age as me, and he also had a young fam extended course that he was undergoing as an was doing much to adjust him to the psycholog induced by what had happened to him. The points out that some patients are removed from home environments after difficult times followi and benefit from the excellent environment at F

Even Rotherham health authority has in recognised the unique facilities at Firbeck f treatment and care. The environment of the h aptly described in its own words in a leaflet that a few years ago. It said:

"the grounds lend themselves to a variety of therap pleasure uses. There are footpaths laid out thr woodlands to demand varying degrees of effort patients, a bowling green, putting green and crick field, and numerous areas suitable for ad hoc rec activities such as volley ball, netball etc. While ma the emphasis on recovery by means of purposeful exe activity, relaxation and social affairs are also the enjoyed. A games room is provided for both therap leisure activities. Snooker tables are available and the a covered skittle alley."

In 1952 the conveyance from the Miners Commission to the Ministry of Health contai following clause:

"The Minister hereby undertakes with the Comm use and maintain the property hereby conveye Rehabilitation Centre primarily for the use of injured in or about coal mines and to use the same for purpose until such time as after consultation Commission he is satisfied that not less adequate al facilities are available to such workers".

Rotherham health authority has failed to main hospital. In its own appraisal, it admits to rec report in May 1983 suggesting that building fab engineering services were in need of refurbishi replacement. We can only assume that it has done since then. The appraisal also states, in paragraph page 22, in relation to the authority's preferred o

I travel on the motorway regularly when going b the House and my Yorkshire constituency. I happ listen to a phone-in programme presented by Nic in December last year, in which the Minister took wonder whether the hon. Lady remembers a call t received from a Mr. Paramoor from Exeter, who s the hospital and ward closures that were then takin In answer to his question the hon. Lady spoke of cottage hospital in South Molton, north Devon, where I understand her relatives came from. She said that closure had been talked of, and:

"then they realised it's nice for people to have not treatment but care."

She went on to describe that care as very valuable and very nice.

The very same phrases could be applied to the many thousands of people who have been in Firbeck hospital over the years; and, indeed, to the patients who are there now, receiving the same treatment and care, rather than simply being brought into a major hospital—perhaps a district general—and being given one or two days a week of out-patient physiotherapy. Firbeck can provide services which can be found nowhere else in the health authority area. They certainly cannot be provided under the options drawn up by the area health authority. I urge the Minister to support me in asking Rotherham health authority to change its mind and keep open and improve—for the benefit of all in the area—the rehabilitation service and the excellent standard of work in the amputee unit at Firbeck.

1.5 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I congratulate the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) on his success in the ballot. It gives me my opportunity to answer my 41st Adjournment debate since coming to this post. I always feel that it is a privilege to have the opportunity to respond to the interests and concerns of hon. Members' constituents in this way, and I shall endeavour to do so again tonight.

The subject that the hon. Gentleman has chosen is of interest to his constituents and the National Union of Mineworkers, which is his sponsor in the House, given Firbeck hospital's origins as a miners' rehabilitation centre. It still provides a service for miners, as do many hospitals in mining areas, including mine. It numbers pit men and ex-pit men among its past and present patients.

It would probably be helpful if I were to explain the procedure concerning variations in services. If there is a substantial variation in health services — it may be something other than closure, such as a change of use—health authorities must consult widely on their plans and consider all the comments. The local community health council must be consulted, and it should submit counter proposals if it disagrees. Any such counter proposals must be carefully considered by the district health authority. The hon. Gentleman will note that I said "must" and not "should".

If the district health authority rejects the counter proposals and reaffirms its original plans, the matter must be referred to the regional health authority. In the case of Firbeck, it would be Trent region. If the regional health authority supports the district's decision and the community health council still objects, the proposal must be referred to Ministers for a final decision. Effectively, therefore, whether a closure comes to Ministers depends on the community health council's view, but we prefer decisions to be taken locally wherever possible.

I can assure the hon. Gentleman that, before reaching a decision, Ministers are scrupulous to take into account and give weight to all of the comments. It is therefore important that we do not commit ourselves in advance bu hear all the arguments. I am glad to have this opportunity to hear at least some of them.

I can outline the facts as they have been represented t me, especially by the district health authority. I understan that Firbeck hospital is situated some nine miles south o Rotherham near the health authority boundary. It is in very attractive area and surrounded by pleasant parkland It was transferred to the NHS nearly 35 years ago Progressively fewer miners have used the hospital, partly because the number of people employed in mining ha reduced substantially during that time, partly because th accident rates in mining are lower—which I am sur everyone here will welcome—and partly because th provision of modern hospitals with improved rehabilita tion facilities elsewhere means that more miners can b treated as out-patients near their homes. That also mus be generally welcome as it is part of an improvement i service.

In 1974, 265 miners received residential treatment. I the first six months of last year, only 58 did. The hospita now also provides residential rehabilitation and out patient and day services for other groups—mainly men but also some women. Their numbers have increased steadily and they now heavily outnumber the miners. I 1982, there were 321 residential and 99 day patients. Since then, patterns of treatment have changed again and, by September 1987 there had been 294 resident and 211 day patients. The shift has gone far more towards day patients.

I understand that a number of problems have prompted the Rotherham district health authority to review the rehabilitation services provided in the district, including that provided at Firbeck but not just the Firbeck service. For example, many of those who use Firbeck come, I understand, from the southern and central parts of the district. It is said that many patients do not receive appropriate rehabilitation treatment because of their inability or unwillingness to make the long journey to Firbeck.

While I take on board entirely what the hon. Gentleman says about improved transport services since 1945, it is a fact that people's expectations of what constitutes a short or a long journey have also shifted since that time, when perhaps people were more prepared to make longer journeys for scarcer services than they are sometimes now. I am told that this problem particularly affects women because public transport to Firbeck is not easily accessible and, of course, many of the women we are talking about are older ladies who may not have the use of a car. Travel to Firbeck can take a considerable time.

At present only limited provision exists in the district for rehabilitation treatment of people with disabling diseases, such as rheumatic conditions, strokes and back injury. The service appears to have developed substantially in response to accidents, and that is welcome, but increasingly the people that we need to care for in this kind of service are those of whom age and infirmity have simply taken their toll. It is felt, I understand, that the maximum benefit to these patients can be obtained by beginning intensive treatment as soon as possible after the onset of illness. The need to be resident at Firbeck hospital or to travel considerable distances for out-patient treatment there causes difficulty.

Apart from that, a condition survey has revealed the need for considerable renovation at Firbeck, despite the expenditure of considerable sums, referred to by the hon.

[Mrs. Edwina Currie]

Gentleman, in the recent past. It has been estimated that the cost could be £750,000. On completion, revenue costs would remain at over £400,000 a year, and even then it would not be possible to use the whole of the building.

A district health authority appraisal has been carried out of the best way to provide services in future—and it is a question of ensuring that these services are provided in the future. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not dream of misleading any of his constituents by implying that these services would simply vanish. At a meeting in October 1987 the Rotherham DHA decided against upgrading Firbeck in favour of developing the rehabilitation service at Badsley Moor lane hospital. It was the authority's view that Badsley Moor lane hospital was better situated, since it is in Rotherham itself, and could, with some capital investment, provide a more comprehensive rehabilitation service for the whole of Rotherham—and it would end up costing only £200,000 a year.

Mr. Barron: I am sure that the hon. Lady has no intention of misleading the House on the matter of costs. I said that the actual revenue costs would be higher; but of the three options discussed, the capital costs are certainly higher on the other two than for the refurbishing of Firbeck hospital. What I said was that, if one looked at the revenue costs and the £200,000 a year difference, it is not a lot in terms of the overall budget of the Rotherham area health authority. The real question must be whether £200,000 out of some £30 million is a lot to take into account when one thinks of this long treatment that can be given to amputees. I know that the health authority in any of its appraisals—which, I assure the hon. Lady, I have read in great detail—has not convinced anybody that there is any long-term treatment for amputees. This is not just for the Rotherham area, of course, but for the whole region.

Mrs. Currie: Happily, I reassure the hon. Gentleman and his constituents that nobody is planning to do away with a long-term service to amputees. If they require a medical service, they will get it. The question, as I understand it, is whether they should get it at Firbeck or somewhere else, and whether they can at the same time see some improvement of the service not only to amputees but to people suffering from other forms of disease. I merely offer him the figures that I have been given. I note his view that £200,000 a year difference in running costs is not much——

Mr. Barron: They would be saving on capital expenditure.

Mrs. Currie: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would allow me to continue, as I have not quite finished.

I was interested also to hear what the hon. Gentleman said about bowls and skittles and the facilities at Firbeck. That is really quite remarkable. I do not think that many hospitals in this country spend National Health Service money on excellent services like that. In my area they are provided either by the miners' welfare or by other organisations. I merely offer that as a thought to the House. The district health authority is now consulting those concerned locally and has invited comments and, if necessary, counter proposals by 29 February. So it rests with the people concerned locally to contact the health authority with their views.

I should stress that the argument is provide care most efficiently and appropri the least stress and trouble to the peo particularly in travelling. It is not about t care provided. The staff at Firbeck are to their dedication and their effort towards p

Obviously I cannot anticipate what the authority will decide, but I understand Gentleman has already discussed the issue authority on 8 January. I will ensure that tonight are brought to the authority's atte they are borne in mind.

I described the procedure earlier, but t one slight variation in the case of Firbecl Gentleman says, the conveyance under whic was handed over to the Health Service som states:

"The Minister hereby undertakes with the Commission to use and maintain the pr conveyed as a Rehabilitation Centre . . . and for no other purpose until such time as afte with the commission he is satisfied that no alternative facilities are available to such wor

We will obviously look at this point ca allowing any change in the service.

I understand also that the Nation Mineworkers may ask for the building bac is taken to close it. If I have to, I will take l that. I offer the hon. Gentleman this th property were to be disposed of through the authority, the proceeds would go strai National Health Service, not to the Treasury else. We would expect a sum of at least £2 would, I understand, stay in Rotherham hea I am sure that most of the hon. Gentleman' would agree that that is a wise procedure an in improvements for the public good. I an agree that the health services in Rotherham I have no information on what the Natio Mineworkers might do either with the buildi money if it was sold by the union.

Mr. Barron: The Minister brings up the q National Union of Mineworkers claiming back. It was the money of coal owners and co bought the hospital. I have had discussi NUM. I have never heard any of the official union wants it back. We want the facility to c used.

Mrs. Currie: I am most grateful to the ho for giving us that information. All the mone release from the sale of assets that are no lo we need in the Health Service, particularly Rotherham. His assurance will be welc constituents. However, we are nowhere nea advice or other decisions on it.

It is important to remember that the H needs to change and to keep up with new d need to develop and improve services within available. We need to realise resources in a been going on to quite an extent in Yorkshire regions. We need to meet changing healt Sometimes we need to recognise the diffe distribution of local people from the tim hospitals were built.

Most changes are agreed locally and m result from the improved services which are pr appropriately and more economically from a different location. It would not be acceptable to the House, in my judgment, to continue to provide inferior health services from old and outdated buildings when better ones could be provided in better or more modern facilities. That is the basis upon which much of the change has been agreed locally.

The Government attach the highest priority to improving and modernising the estate. Since 1979 at least 176 schemes costing more than £1 million have been completed in the Health Service, providing over 20,000 new beds. There have also been many smaller facilities completed. There have been closures, but the service in terms of patients treated has increased enormously being provided broadly speaking from more mode better located hospitals and other facilities.

The process will continue. About £1 billion will b this year on capital projects. Throughout England 470 schemes, each costing over £1 million, with value of over £3 billion, are at various stages of pla design and construction. In Rotherham, as elsewh hope to see the benefits of that massive record b programme. We hope—we are assured—that, wh decisions are taken about Firbeck, they will be entirely in the interests of the patients concerned.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. Lilley: Since the fall in stock markets it has apparent that most major economies were growin rapidly than seemed to be the case at the time. United Kingdom economy, we predict 3 per cent. in the non-oil economy, which is very healthy inde major countries of the world have co-operated in e that the difficult period following the financial crisis has been coped with.

Mr. Wray: Does the Minister agree that the estimates state clearly and categorically that the rate will fall from 2·75 per cent. to 1·75 per cent. i Is the Chancellor really saying that after he has sol the country's assets there will not be a recessio slump, when there is an estimated balance of pa deficit of £5·2 billion?

Mr. Lilley: I do not think that anyone categorical about growth rates in 1989. However, be reasonably assured that there will be some gr 1988, albeit perhaps more modest than in the pa said, the British economy looks set to do particula in spite of the gloom that the hon. Mr. Holland: Surely the fact is that towards the last year the Chancellor said that there was no p having a Group of Seven meeting unless the agreement. There was no meeting, and there agreement on anything significant. The statement at the end of December did not stabilise the markets until Governments intervened. The whole of OECD is now slowing down, and the effects of cuts in the United States budget deficit will aggravate that. How on earth can the Government be confident that the United Kingdom economy will continue to grow when the rest of the world is slowing down? Why do they not hold a meeting of the G7 countries to meet those targets for recovery asked for by United States Treasury Secretary Baker last year?

Mr. Lilley: The G7 statement did help to stabilise financial markets.

Mr. Holland: Why did the Government intervene?

Mr. Lilley: We never comment on intervention by the British Government. If the hon. Gentleman believes statements that other countries were intervening, he can draw that inference from the G7 statement. We are reasonably confident that the British economy will do well in future because the policies that have brought us prosperity are precisely the policies needed in times of difficulty, if difficulty should arise.

The Opposition's response to the past three questions sounds rather like the Noel Coward song that bad times are just around the corner.

Mr. John Townend: Does my hon. Friend agree that, because of the twin deficits—the trade deficit and the federal deficit in America—America cannot continue to be the engine of the world's economy? Britain is playing its part; its high growth rate has resulted in a small balance of payments surplus. Does my hon. Friend think that the two surplus countries of Japan and Germany are doing enough to fill the gap left by America?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend is quite correct. It is important that the surplus countries as well as the deficit countries play their part in removing the imbalances that have plagued the world economy. The Japanese economy is growing strongly in terms of domestic demand and we hope to see a strengthening of growth in Germany as well. My hon. Friend is right. The British economy has been the strongest growing major economy in the western world.

Mr. Beith: Do not the Chancellor's autumn forecasts depend on major corrections in the United States economy and on an expansion in domestic demand in West Germany and Japan? As that has been the subject of the Foreign Secretary's discussions with the Japanese Government, how can the Minister regard it as a fruitless subject for discussion?

Mr. Lilley: No country in the OECD sets quantitative targets for GDP growth. That was the basis of the question that I answered initially. The outlook in Japan is for quite strong domestic growth, which will contribute to the removal of imbalances between Japan and the United States, and that is something that I welcome. I also welcome the presence of the hon. Member for Berwick-on-Tweed (Mr. Beith) today. I was sorry that he was not in the Select Committee yesterday when we were discussing, among other matters, VAT. We would have been interested to hear his views on where he would apply it.

Mr. Soames: Does my hon. Friend agree that growth within the OECD is inextricably linked to free trade? Will he assure the House that, together with our OECD partners, we will do all that we can to promote free trade with Japan?

corner, will the Chancellor confirm that Treasury forecasts show that next year there will be a higher rate of inflation, a lower rate of growth and a worse payments crisis than last year? What does he think Noel Coward would have said about that?

Mr. Lawson: I will not answer the last part of the question, because to sing it would be out of order. Certainly the forecast is for a slightly higher rate of inflation in the fourth quarter—not for the whole year, because we do not make that forecast—of 1988 than there was in the fourth quarter of 1987. Nevertheless, that rate of inflation forecast for the fourth quarter of 1988 is not merely one quarter of the average rate of inflation when the Labour Government were in office, but is only about one half of the lowest figure that they achieved in any month during the whole of their period in office. As for the forecast rate of non-oil growth, it may be lower than last year, but it is higher than the Labour Government ever achieved in any year of their term of office.

Sir William Clark: Is my right hon. Friend aware that most thinking people are well aware that one of this country's main achievements under his guidance has been the low rate of inflation?

Mr. Holland: What about mass unemployment?

Sir William Clark: Does my right hon. Friend further agree that the one thing any Government can do to help people on fixed incomes—pensioners and the like—is to keep the rate of inflation down so that the value of their money does not deteriorate, as it did in the 1970s?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. During his very thoughtful and accurate question I heard a sedentary interjection from one of the junior Opposition spokesmen that there is mass unemployment. I should have thought on this day, when we have the figures showing that there has been a fall in unemployment over the past year of over 500,000, the highest ever fall in unemployment, that at least would have been welcomed by the Opposition.

Mr. Chris Smith: If the Chancellor places such importance on the rate of inflation—as he clearly does, because he said yesterday to the NEDC that avoidance of inflation was at the "very heart" of Government economic policy—why have he and his Government taken a series of decisions in the past three months deliberately to fuel inflation by pushing up electricity prices, rents in the private and public sectors, water rates and nationalised industry prices? Is he proud of that?

Mr. Lawson: I afraid that the hon. Member does not have the first idea of what causes inflation or what the rate of inflation is. The rate of inflation now is far lower than anything achieved by the Labour Government during their period in office. Not only does it compare very well with our past, but our relative inflation performance compared with other major countries has improved substantially.

available throughout the Community. I have every confidence that my colleagues among Finance Ministers in the Community will have read of the developments concerning share purchasers to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Watts: Will my right hon. Friend impress on his European colleagues that there is no need for any increase in EEC own resources and that their priority should be the imposition of firm budgetary control, which was promised at Fontainebleau but for which we are still waiting?

Mr. Brooke: Whichever Minister represents the British Government at Ecofin, he will certainly bear in mind what my hon. Friend has said. However, as the European Council will be meeting in Brussels the following week, there will be an even more adequate opportunity then.

Mr. Gordon Brown: On the question of the EEC's VAT proposals, and notwithstanding the new proposals of the third party, the fourth party and the fifth party in British politics, does the Minister agree that, outside the alliance and Lord Cockfield, there is no public support for any attempt to impose VAT on vital necessities? Will he give us the assurance, which he has not yet given that the Government will implement none of Lord Cockfield's demands.

Mr. Brooke: We have made a number of specific pledges concerning zero-rating, and the House would not expect me to add to them today.

Industrial Productivity

6. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the growth of industrial productivity in the British economy over the last 12 months.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Major): In the three months to October 1987 manufacturing output per head is estimated to have been 7¼ per cent. higher than a year earlier.

Mr. Stevens: Does my right hon. Friend agree that that substantial increase in productivity is a major factor in keeping British industry internationally competitive? Will he also confirm that manufacturing output is growing faster than at any time since the early 1970s?

Mr. Major: I certainly confirm what my hon. Friend has said. I should add that manufacturing output has now recovered from its loss during the recessionary period of 1980-81. Output is now above pre-recession levels and is rising sharply. We expect that it will continue to do so.

Mr. Morgan: Would the Minister care to comment on the statement made last week in Dundee by the governor of the Bank of England, who said that growth in the British economy was unsustainably rapid? Before the governor made that statement, were his views discussed with the Government or, as his train passed through Nottingham on the way to Dundee, did he have the idea of forming his own branch of the UDM—the union of disgruntled monetarists?

Mr. Major: I certainly cannot say whether the latter point is true. However, the governor was echoing what my right hon. Friend said to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service some time before. Specifically, my right hon. Friend said that the rate of growth prior to October, which was substantially above trend, was not likely or expected to be sustained next year. However, output next year in the non-oil economy is expected to be 3 per cent. and that represents a substantial level of growth and is substantially higher than that achieved at any stage under the previous Labour Government.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one reason for this rapid increase in output and growth is that, today, it is worth working because one can keep more of what one earns? Therefore, while it is welcome that the Labour party supports reducing the proportion of GNP that is taken in taxes by cutting spending, is it not unfortunate that it is only the New Zealand Labour party which supports that policy?

Mr. Major: I understand that, from time to time, attempts have been made to introduce some of the ideas of the New Zealand Labour party to the Labour party of this country, but with minimal success. My hon. Friend is entirely right about the supply side effects of lower taxation, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is acutely aware of those effects.

Mr. John Smith: If the Minister is claiming success for the Government's industry policies, can he explain why a balance of trade surplus of £5 billion has been turned into a deficit of £8 billion? What is the Government's strategy for correcting that difficulty?

Mr. Major: The right hon. and learned Gentleman will know that in the period since 1981, and for the first time in many years, export volumes have grown at a similar rate to the world trade in manufactures. That feat was not achieved at any time during 1974-79. The right hon. and learned Gentleman — uncharacteristically in my judgment—is selling British manufacturing short. It is doing exceedingly well, and the size of our export volumes is the clearest possible illustration of that success. The size of the import volumes has a direct relationship with the fact that the British economy is growing substantially faster than that of our competitors. The right hon. and learned Gentleman should be well aware of that.

Industry (Costs)

7. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the relative benefit to British industry of (a) 1 per cent. off interest rates and (b) 1 per cent. off pay rises.

Mr. Lilley: A 1 per cent. moderation in pay rises would be worth roughly four times as much to British industry as a 1 per cent. reduction of interest rates, even if that were sustained for a full year.

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those extremely interesting figures. Does he believe that industry could help itself by keeping a tighter grip on its unit pay costs and thereby ensure that inflation falls, which would lead to a decline in interest rates? Does he also believe that the statistics would be extremely helpful if those on the Opposition Front Bench understood what causes inflation?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to highlight the importance of industry keeping control of its pay costs. I should especially like to pay tribute to the management and employees of the export industries, because the strong rise in productivity that they have achieved has enabled them to keep their pay costs stable up to now, despite the considerable increases in the real earnings of the employees.

Mr. Grocott: On the subject of interest rates, has the Minister had a chance to see the evidence from the National Consumer Council on consumer credit, which shows that eight chain stores are charging rates of interest between 32 and 39·9 per cent.? Does he not agree that that is a swindle, and what will he do about it?

Mr. Lilley: I have not seen the figures to which the hon. Gentleman referred, but I shall examine them. It is now obligatory on those offering credit to make clear the terms on which they offer that credit. The best guarantee that people are not swindled is that they have competitive alternatives to which they can turn.

International Finance Ministers

8. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he is next due to meet the Finance Ministers of the other major industrial countries to discuss the international financial situation.

10. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he is next due to meet the Finance Ministers of the other major industrialised countries.

Mr. Lawson: I am in regular contact with my opposite numbers in other G7 countries.

Mr. Smith: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the factors that makes it difficult for managers in industry and commerce, especially those involved in exports, to forecast and plan ahead is the volatility of exchange rates? What measures will he be urging upon his counterparts at the next meeting to try to achieve greater stability in exchange rates?

Mr. Lawson: I agree with my hon. Friend. What are needed within a climate of low inflation all round are domestic policies that will sustain reasonable stability in exchange rates, which is of the first importance to successful trade and industry. I hope to say a little more about that in the debate that will follow later today.

Mr. Bowis: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is good news that we have had five consecutive years of growth in the Group of Seven industrialised countries? It is doubly good news that Britain is at the top of the league for such growth. It is a pity that Britain is at the top of another league table—the league table of the Opposition parties, who see nothing but unremitting gloom and despondency every time that something goes right.

Mr. Lawson: That is a characteristic of the Opposition, and a rather sad one. It is not doing them any good, or doing any credit to the country as a whole. I found it particularly interesting at the meeting of NEDC yesterday, which I had the honour of chairing— [Interruption.] This is a very moving moment in the history of the House, with the entry of the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), but we are still one short.

It was very striking that at the meeting of NEDC yesterday afternoon the TUC openly acknowledged the economic success and the economic strength of Britain at present. The argument was over priorities. Our priorities were different from its priorities, but it acknowledged Britain's economic success and strength.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Has the Chancellor of the Exchequer seen today's reports that the United States is selling special drawing rights for yen? That is the nearest thing to selling gold for yen. Does the Chancellor believe those reports, and if he does, does he think that the United States will properly defend its currency?

Mr. Lawson: I have seen those reports and I have no idea at present whether they are true, but clearly that would be a move consistent with a determined American attempt to defend the dollar.

Mr. Mullin: What does the Chancellor think would be the career prospects for a Finance Minister in Europe or in Kuwait who sold 20 per cent. of his country's largest company to a foreign power at knock-down prices?

Mr. Lawson: The shares were sold by Her Majesty's Government at a very good price indeed. It was certainly not a knock-down price, and the British taxpayer did very well as a result of that. Contrary to what the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) predicted, we have had to buy back only a tiny proportion, less than 2 per cent. It is true that following the stock market fall those shares fell considerably, along with many others, and the Kuwait Investment Office took the opportunity to buy, not all of them, but a substantial block of those shares. Anybody could have done that. However, as I told the House on Monday, it has given an assurance that it has no intention of seeking control of BP, nor any management role.

Mr. Yeo: Will my right hon. Friend reassure the House that he will avoid committing too much of Britain's financial resources to concerted foreign exchange support operations for the dollar until it is clear that the United States Government are adopting policies that are themselves likely to produce a firmer currency?

Mr. Lawson: That is certainly a policy position which I have taken throughout. During the greater part of the period since the Louvre agreement the Americans had been following such policies and were fully committed to the defence of the dollar. There was a period towards the end of last year when that commitment by the American Government appeared to be in doubt. Subsequently, however, they have taken action which suggests that they intend to defend their currency. The commitment of the United States is crucial, both in terms of intervention and in terms of the appropriate internal domestic policies.

EC (Internal Market)

9. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the feasibility of the internal market of the European Economic Community in the absence of the harmonisation of value added taxation rates.

Mr. Brooke: The Government strongly support the removal of barriers to trade within the Community, but they do not believe that approximation of VAT rates is a necessary part of this process.

Mr. Cryer: If the Minister takes that view, will he formally repudiate the views of the Conservative appointee on the EEC Commission, Lord Cockfield, who believes that harmonisation of VAT is necessary? If he repudiates Lord Cockfield's views — and he has the opportunity to do so now—will he also repudiate any attempt by the Government to put VAT on food, fuel and clothing, or on books and newspapers, which would be a tax on knowledge for the first time in our history?

Mr. Brooke: Lord Cockfield is in no sense answerable to the Government. It will not have escaped the hon. Member's attention that there have been disagreements between the Government and Lord Cockfield in the context of his proposals. In response to an earlier question I indicated that I will be making no further pledges during the afternoon beyond those already given.

Mr. Higgins: As the Government have made it clear that they propose to use their veto, if necessary, to defend the zero-rating concept, will my right hon. Friend make it absolutely clear to the Commission that there is no point in putting forward proposals which involve its abolition?

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend is correct in stating the Government's position. The approximation proposals are unacceptable as drafted, but discussion between member states is at a very early stage and it would be wrong to anticipate the outcome. The United Kingdom is committed to completion of the single market, but how this is best achieved is a matter for discussion between member states. I repeat the pledges on zero-rating which have already been given by the Prime Minister.

Dr. Marek: The country will wish to know that the Minister will resist the arguments for value added tax of the party or parties of whom two representatives sit below the Gangway. The Minister has said that the Government have made specific pledges about what they will do and what they will allow in regard to the introduction of VAT. In view of this important occasion, will he list those pledges specifically? Do they include books, periodicals and medicines?

Mr. Brooke: I share the hon. Gentleman's interest in the proposals that have emerged from the alliance Benches. But even into the life of the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) some pleasure must have entered yesterday when the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) issued a statement saying that he was opposed to VAT on food. As to the pledges, those that have been given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister relate to food, domestic fuel and children's clothing and footwear.

Economic Outlook

11. Mr. Knox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the economic outlook for the rest of the current financial year.

Mr. Major: The United Kingdom economy continues to show the winning combination of strong growth, low inflation and sound public finance.

Mr. Knox: The Chancellor's economic policies have resulted in a substantial reduction in unemployment during the past year. Does my right hon. Friend think that present policies will result in a similar reduction in unemployment during the next 12 months, and does he think that there is any chance that unemployment will be less than 2 million in a year's time?

Mr. Major: I certainly do not propose to make forecasts of the future rate of unemployment. My hon. Friend is entirely correct to point out that unemployment has fallen by over half a million in the last year and 300,0 in the last six months, and today's figures again sho unemployment down by 35,000. I am particularly pleas to see youth unemployment down and an especial welcome fall in the west midlands, Wales, the north-we and the north.

Mr. Ashley: Will the Chief Secretary bear in mind th the collapsing dollar is very greatly damaging to o export industries, especially the pottery industr Notwithstanding what was said a moment ago about o exports, will he do what he can to strengthen the dollar i order to aid our exports?

Mr. Major: The fall in the dollar is undoubtedl unsettling, as my right hon. Friend has made clear on number of occasions. The performance of British export in recent months has been excellent and we are keen t ensure that that contiinues.

Mr. McCrindle: Does my right hon. Friend perceiv any danger of overheating in the economy in the month that lie ahead? Can he give the House any indication o what steps the Government have it within their power t take if that trend should develop?

Mr. Major: We do not see any signs of overheating, s I think that the second part of my hon. Friend's questio does not arise.

International Debt

12. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what initiatives he is taking with Finance Ministers of creditor countries to address the re-scheduling of a share of the debt of Latin American countries.

Mr. Lilley: The United Kingdom will continue to play its part, along with other creditor countries, in rescheduling its share of developing countries' official debt at the Paris Club. As for commercial debts, that is a matter for the banks and countries concerned.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: But is it not true that at the end of the day the bill for Third world debt written off by the banks may well be paid by the taxpayer, as banks write off losses against profits? If that is the case, does it not mean that the taxpayer may well be paying for ill-considered and unnecessary projects in some Third world countries? And, if that is the case, would it not be better to spend public money, taxpayers' money, in another way by simply increasing the amount of money available for Third world aid?

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Gentleman misunderstands the nature of tax relief. If banks or other companies fail to make a profit, they do not pay tax. No money is handed out by the Treasury to them, and therefore there is no money available that is now going to them that could instead go to underdeveloped countries.

13. Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what responses he has received to his 1987 initiative to deal with the problem of developing countries' debt.

Mr. Lawson: My initiative has been widely welcomed. Many countries have followed the United Kingdom's lead in converting past aid loans to grants and the Paris Club has agreed to several extended reschedulings of official debts. I am continuing to press for interest rate reductions on such reschedulings. Following my initiative, the managing director of the IMF launched a separate proposal for interest rate assistance with these countries' multilateral debts via an expansion of the fund's structural adjustment facility.

Mr. Redwood: While welcoming the excellent initiative of the Chancellor, may I ask him whether he agrees that the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund should go much further in expediting progress in this area by themselves writing off and making adequate provisions against the debts which they are putting on their books at unrealistic levels?

Mr. Lawson: I think that the international institutions, which are backed by Governments, are in a very different position from commercial banks, which have to make sure that, if there are bad or doubtful debts, provision is properly made for them. It is, indeed, a matter of importance to the supervisory authorities in this country and other countries to ensure that that is done. I welcome what the commercial banks have been doing in this regard.

Mr. Skinner: Is not the truth of the matter that in this financial year the amount of money that will be set against income tax relief in respect of the four main banks in Britain will be of the order of £1,000 million? Will the right hon. Gentleman also confirm that in the next financial year it is proposed that those debt provisions will rise even beyond that figure? Since the British public is of the view that we ought to be helping Third world countries, would it not make sense for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to allow money to go to Third world countries to bail them out, instead of bailing out the British banks?

Mr. Lawson: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has wasted the time of the House by asking precisely the same question, based on precisely the same conception as his hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) asked, and which was answered by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary. If a bank lends money to any borrower, whether an industrial customer or an overseas sovereign Government, and it turns out to be a bad debt, obviously there is tax relief on the bad debt. That is the law of the land. Equally, if, at the end of the day, the debt is paid, the tax relief in unwound.

PRIME MINISTER

Military Hospitals (Departmental Co-ordination)

Q1. Mr Jessel: To ask the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the co-ordination between the Secretaries of State for Defence and for Social Services concerning the use of beds in military hospitals for National Health Service patients.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): Yes, Sir. Some 34,000 National Health Service in-patients, 4,000 day patients and 200,000 out-patients are treated annually in military hospitals in the United Kingdom. Ways of increasing the number of National Health Service patients treated in military hospitals are being considered by my right hon. Friends.

Mr. Jessel: As the hospitals of the Royal Navy, the Army and the Royal Air Force, which have excellent standards, now take 34,000 National Health Service in-patients every year and could take very many thousands more—on 6 January they had 495 beds available—will my right hon. Friend please urgently consider how they can take more? In particular, will she please consider whether waiting list money can be further applied?

The Prime Minister: I am very much aware of my right hon. and hon. Friend's concern to see that we get as much health care out of the facilities as we possibly can. The ordinary health authorities can apply for waiting list money if they know of beds which are free in military hospitals and can made an arrangement for patients to be treated there, so we are going in the direction required by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Cryer: Does the Prime Minister agree that the armed forces could provide more beds for National Health Service use and, indeed, provide facilities for the National Health Service — which is being cut back under her Government — if she adopted different priorities and shifted the £11 billion she is spending on nuclear weapons in the form of Trident to the National Health Service? In that way the continuing complaints about operations not being carried out would be brought to an end and we could spend money on patient care, instead of on mass extermination.

The Prime Minister: The National Health Service is not being cut back. Over and above inflation, there has been provision for an extra 30 per cent. for the National Health Service. The hon. Gentleman might have got muddled up with the record of his own Government, who, 10 years ago, cut back the National Health Service, and who also cut in real terms nurses' and doctors' pay. Under this Government, the money has gone up, the number of nurses and doctors has gone up and the pay has gone up.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about beds in military hospitals.

Sir Michael Shaw: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the limitation on the number of National Health Service patients dealt with by the services has been caused by a long-running wrangle between the Ministry of Defence and the DHSS? We on the Public Accounts Committee have been assured that that wrangle will reach a satisfactory conclusion by 31 March. Has that same assurance been given to my right hon. Friend?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend heard, 34,000 National Health Service in-patients are being treated by military hospitals, as are a lot of day patients and out-patients. I can assure my hon. Friend that health authorities are being encouraged to consider every possibility, including military hospitals, when putting in their bids for allocations from the waiting list fund. In view of my hon. Friend's question, I shall make further inquiries to ensure that what he wants is happening.

Engagements

Q2. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Nellist: With Matthew Collier critical, Matthew Mulhall and Adrian Woolford of Coventry still waiting, when the parents of the 90 bairns in the Midlands desperately waiting for life-saving heart surgery come to London on Monday afternoon to present to No. 10 petitions with over 50,000 signatures, will the Prime Minister meet them personally, or will she be too frightened to explain to them which children will live and which will not?

The Prime Minister: I shall not meet them personally. [HON. MEMBERS: "Shame"] I remind the hon. Gentleman that that particular hospital was designated a supra-regional centre only in 1984, under a Tory Government, and since then over 560 open heart operations have been performed. There are vastly more open heart operations performed now than there used to be, and some 3,000 babies survive now who would not have survived eight years ago.

Q2. Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Atkinson: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the first phase of the new Bournemouth general hospital in my constituency is due to be opened later this year? Is she also aware that that hospital was planned to be built 10 years ago but that, like so many others, it was a victim of Labour's incompetence in government, which brought the country to the brink of bankruptcy? Should we not be reminded more frequently of the chaos and cuts in the NHS under the Labour Government?

The Prime Minister: Yes. The Labour Government not only cut the capital programme for hospitals, but, as I have said, cut nurses' and doctors' pay in real terms. The NHS has expanded enormously under us, as has the capital programme, and the number of nurses, the number of patients treated, both in-patients and out-patients, and the number of treatments have gone up.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister tell us why she opposes the Protection of Official Information Bill of her hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), or is it a secret?

The Prime Minister: For the reasons that have already been given in the House and elsewhere, because of the great complexity of the matter, because of the Government's responsibility for such matters and because we are considering a White Paper with a view to bringing forward a Bill. It is vital that this matter is dealt with by a Government measure.

Mr. Kinnock: Is not it obvious that the Prime Minister's case is weak and that is why she has to Whip? In any case, the Prime Minister knows very well that the full facilities of the Government could so easily be put at the disposal of the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills as he takes the Bill through the House, so her excuses are absurd. When even her right hon. and hon. Friends describe her attitude to and tactics on the Bill as "monstrous", "dangerous", "a political SAS" and as the tactics of the gulag, is it not obvious that her response has nothing to do with state security, and everything to do with a shallow, spiteful and spurious attitude?

The Prime Minister: We believe that a private Member's Bill is not the appropriate way to secure changes in this difficult and sensitive area affecting the nation's security, especially when a revisionary Bill s section 2 of the Official Secrets Act started its jo the other place in 1979 but did not secure passag I remind the right hon. Gentleman that we need no in security from him.

Mr. Gardiner: Will my right hon. Friend today that the purpose of the National Health Service i further the interests or feather the nests of COH NUPE? Will she further confirm that the purpose tendering is to secure more resources for the Service to devote to patient care? Will she th condemn these foolish strikes?

The Prime Minister: I obviously confirm what m Friend has said. The purpose of the National Service is to bring more care to the patient. V enabling treatments to be brought to the patient were not available some years ago. We all regr strikes. They are strikes at the expense of the patien I hope they will be condemned on both sides of the Q4. Mr. James Lamond: To ask the Prime Min she will list her official engagements for Thursd January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Lamond: Is the right hon. Lady aware th Manchester royal infirmary is facing its greatest cr 200 years? It is having to issue warnings to its emp that it may not be able to pay their wages. Why do continue to suggest that the only solution to this pr lies in increasing income tax, when she knows ver that her right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exch has billions of pounds in his pocket ready to be pai in income tax cuts? A fraction of those cuts placed disposal of the National Health Service would re fears from people, young and old, who are concerne the future.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend has al made more resources available to the National H Service this year, and next year about £1·1 billion extr be made available out of the taxpayers' pocket. Next the average family will pay £1,600 to the National H Service. That is a considerable amount. We are tryi see that full value for money is obtained from that.

There are vast differences in efficiency bet hospitals and between the ways in which the mon used, and our duty is to get the best value for money of the resources that go into the Health Service.

Q5. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Min if she will list her official engagements for Thursda January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the r that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend confirm the Conservative party remains the only party fir committed to the modernisation of the British nuc deterrent through Trident, given that the commitmen the Social and Liberal Democrats to that lasted all of th hours?

The Prime Minister: I confirm that we are fir committed to modernising the independent nucl deterrent with Trident. For one fleeting moment, I thought that we might be joined by another party, but apparently, as soon as it had a policy, it withdrew it.

Mr. Salmond: Does the Prime Minister recall the pledges freely given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the House on 31 March 1982 on "Britoil's crucial independence"? When will those pledges be honoured?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor made a statement this week on his attitude to using the golden share in Britoil. That statement stands.

Mr. Leigh: When my right hon. Friend next meets or talks to her colleagues who are Heads of European Governments and receives their congratulations on becoming the longest-serving Prime Minister this century, will she remind them, as diplomatically as only she knows how, that she would certainly not have remained Prime Minister for so long, or even have become Prime Minister, if she had proposed as loopy a suggestion as that we should tax the clothes we give our children, the books they read and the food that we give them to eat? Will she remind them that one would need to have monumental hubris to expect to survive in political life by proposing such measures?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The undertakings that we gave on this matter during the election — not putting VAT on food or children's clothing — stand in full, of course. Again, for one moment, I thought that another party might have a policy like that, but I quickly understood that it had not.

Q7. Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Callaghan: Is the Prime Minister aware of the report last week that, under the 30-year rule, the file on Hugh Gaitskell had been embargoed? Does that have any connection with the allegation in "Spycatcher" that the former Leader of the Labour party was assassinated?

The Prime Minister: That file was withheld in accordance with rules which are understood by the whole House and in precise accordance with some of those rules. It has been withheld for those reasons. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Devlin: During her busy day, will my right hon. Friend take time to consider the situation in my constituency? Does she agree that parents of children in Cleveland are no different from parents in any other part of the country and that consequently, although at the end of the inquiry we may take individual measures, we should seek to reform the law relating to children and parents generally?

The Prime Minister: I take note of the point made effectively by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Prime Minister recall the famous words in which she suggested that the National Health Service was safe in her hands? In view of the perpetual crisis in the service over recent months and the tragic cases that have been highlighted in the press, will she now recognise that many people throughout the country believe that she has blood on those hands?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to inform the hon. Gentleman that for every five in-patient cases treated in 1979, six were treated this year. For every 10 out-patient cases, 11 have been treated this year. For every one heart bypass operation in 1978, there have been three this year. For every three hip replacement operations in 1978, there have been four this year. For every two cataract operations in 1978, there have been three this year. For every two cervical smear tests in 1978, there have been three this year. For every two chronic renal failure treatments in 1978, there have been five this year. That is a splendid record of success.

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the Leader of the House. I congratulate him on his additional appointment, although I am sure that all hon. Members will regret the reason why that additional office had been thrust upon him.

Now that the Secretary of State for Social Services has conceded to the presidents of the royal colleges that it is necessary to increase "total resources", to use the Secretary of State's words, and the efficiency of their use in the National Health Service, can we look forward to further candour from the right hon. Gentleman during the Opposition day on the Health Service next week? Can we look forward to, for instance, the announcement of further funds which are essential if hospitals are to clear the £70 million-worth of deficits which still remain in this financial year and which must be lifted if the next financial year is not to begin with another under-funding crisis in the NHS?

Yesterday the Secretary of State for the Environment confirmed in a written answer that he had asked the Nature Conservancy Council to examine the scope for the privatisation of the nation's natural reserves. May we now have an urgent debate on the Government's intentions towards conservation and the future of the national heritage? Clearly, nothing is safe from the Government's predatory instincts, not even our countryside.

Given that this week we have seen yet a further erosion of the Government's support for firms involved in high technology, may we have a statement on industrial research and development which w exactly how the Government propose that w assistance from innovation will somehow adv industries on which our future as a natio especially when our competitors are doing th and giving more support to their advanced ind

The House will have noticed the gravity of posed by the massive increase in illegal imports May we have a statement on what the Governm to do about this and whether they will recruit the customs staff that are estimated to be necessa with this murderous traffic?

Finally, will the Leader of the House now te the House will have an opportunity to debate the of the House of Commons? Can he also tell us w is willing to cast off his coyness and join those want this change and want it quickly?

Mr. Wakeham: First, I thank the right hon. G for his remarks at the beginning and say that I ar whole House is sad that Lord Whitelaw has hac from active politics. We all wish him a conti speedy recovery, which is going on at prese MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

With regard to the other matters that the ri Gentleman raised, of course the debate next w enable my right hon. Friend to make quite position regarding funding of the National Healt As I understand it, the meeting with senior gentlemen that took place yesterday was to discus that the increase in funding that had alrea announced was going to assist the NHS and co improve its record.

With regard to the Nature Conservancy Cou understand it too—but I will check the matter right hon. Friend — a period of consultati discussion is still going on, but I will see when is appropriate time to have a debate. It is obvious important matter that we shall have to come t House.

With regard to research and development pla not right for a statement to be given at the mom many of the issues raised are just the sort of issues, to you, Mr. Speaker, that could well be part of the on the Regional Development Grants (Terminati that will take place on 25 January.

On the question of cocaine and drugs generall certainly refer the matter to the Home Secretary have nothing to say at the moment.

I am sorry that I have not been able to announc the date of the televising debate, as I had intended but I can undertake to announce a date in my next b statement next week. I am anxious to have a debat time I said—around the end of the month. I thi the right hon. Gentleman will have to wait, if it is concern to him, for the views that I shall express day.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): The Leader House will know that the issues relating to aborti often emotive. I hope that he will agree that a Member's Bill that has secured time for debate Floor of the House will be enabled to be discusse for the House to arrive at a conclusion. I ask my righ Friend, therefore, whether he will give an under that, if any attempt is made to prevent a proper debate on Friday week, he will ensure that the House is given an opportunity to reach a decision on this most grave and important matter?

Mr. Wakeham: I of course recognise my right hon. Friend's concern in the matter, although the point that he raises is hypothetical at present. I hope very much that it will not become a reality. However, I am sure that the House would wish to protect private Members' time if the chance to reach a decision on the Bill were threatened by the use of procedural devices.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Will the Leader of the House confirm that the announcement that he has made about the motions relating to Scottish rating and valuation on Tuesday night arises on a prayer that has been tabled in the name of my right hon. Friend and hon. Friends? If that is the case, may I warmly welcome the fact that these important regulations on poll tax implementation can be discussed? The opportunity to do so will be widely welcomed.

Has the Leader of the House yet had time to assimilate the results of the debate that we had only last night on the setting up of a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs? May we expect a statement and debate in the near future so that the Committee may be set up and start working on important issues north of the border?

Mr. Wakeham: I use the word "friend" with some care in these matters, but certainly the hon. Gentleman sitting on the hon. Member's left, the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), wrote to me on these matters and I confirm that it was what I take to be the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends who tabled this prayer that will be the subject of the debate next week.

As regards last night's debate, I was pleased to see the more flexible stance taken during the debate. The next thing is to read Hansard and see exactly what everyone's position is. Then we will decide how best to proceed from there.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Has my right hon. Friend had an opportunity to study early-day motion 372 in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood)?

[That this House believes that honourable and right honourable Members should keep their speeches to 10 minutes or less when requested by Mr. Speaker in order to give more backbench Members of all parties an opportunity to speak, excepting only the four principal speakers in each debate.]

Will he consider, in conjunction with Mr. Speaker, the possibility of reintroducing the experiment which was very successful in the last Parliament, because any restraint on the length of speeches by windbags, especially Privy Council windbags, would be very welcome?

Mr. Wakeham: I have a great deal of sympathy with my hon. Friend. The intention is to get agreement to change Standing Orders to make this a permanent feature, but it is one of a number of procedural changes that we are considering, and I will make progress as soon as I can.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Leader of the House reflect a little on what he said in reply to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) about the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs? Will he concede that the initiative lies in his hands and that, while the Committee of Selection cou theoretically take certain steps, he should take t initiative and put down a motion to get the Sele Committee established? Since Opposition Members ha shown flexibility, is it not his responsibility, in keepi with his duties as Leader of the House, to take t initiative and put down a motion as soon as possible?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that the Committee Selection is awaiting further guidance but, as I said to t hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (M Kirkwood), I was pleased to see the flexible stance take by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (M Dewar). If that had clearly been the Labour party positio earlier on, the Committee of Selection would not ha needed to report in the terms that it did. Once we ha studied last night's debate in Hansard, it will be a questio of proceeding to discussions.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): My right hon. Friend will b aware that, in the exceptionally interesting and wid ranging paper on the reorganisation of the Department o Trade and Industry published yesterday, there is proposal that part of the Department should b restructured so that it could play a full part in assessing th contribution which science and technology could make t the economic success of the nation. Does my right hon Friend not agree that not only the DTI but also this Hous should have an opportunity to make such an assessment Is such an assessment not long overdue?

Mr. Wakeham: I agree with my hon. Friend tha discussions on matters of science and technology ar something for which he has been pressing me for som time. He puts it in a slightly different way, but I recognis the validity of his case. It is an important matter, but hope that my hon. Friend will also appreciate that at thi time in the Session there is a considerable amount o important Government business to deal with, so I canno offer him time for that in the immediate future. I will however, bear it in mind and, as soon as we have a bit mor scope, we will do something about it.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the Leade of the House aware that the Cabinet papers just released under the 30-year rule show that, at the British nuclea tests in the Pacific, no high-level consideration was give to the safety of our service men, and the chiefs of staf admitted that they were dealing with an unknown quantity? As British nuclear test veterans have still received no compensation, could we have a debate on the matter as soon as possible?

Mr. Wakeham: I appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's concern, but I cannot promise him an early debate on the matter.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the Home Secretary's announcement that a White Paper on the reform of the Official Secrets Act will be produced in June. Can he assure the House that we shall have the opportunity of a full debate on this important subject before the summer recess?

Mr. Wakeham: Yes, I can confirm that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary hopes to lay before Parliament in June a White Paper on the reform of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act, and I can assure my hon. Friend that the House will be given an opportunity to debate it before the summer recess.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the Leader of the House aware of increasing concern that the Murdoch group is to take a larger stake in the Pearson group, so that the Financial Times could come under the control of Mr. Murdoch? Will the Leader of the House recognise that it would be completely wrong for that gentleman to own even more of the British press, and will he promise a statement early next week if necessary?

Mr. Wakeham: As the hon. Gentleman knows, clear rules are laid down governing mergers and takeovers of newspapers. I assure him that my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will conduct himself entirely in accordance with those rules and that a statement will be made if one is required.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Bearing in mind the request made by the Leader of the Opposition for an early debate on the televising of Parliament, does my right hon. Friend agree that the scant respect for the great traditions and values of the House of Commons shown by many Opposition Members will do nothing to advance the cause of an early debate or, indeed, of the televising of Parliament?

Mr. Wakeham: Regardless of whether it advances the cause of an early debate, it is certainly a factor that a number of my hon. Friends will want to consider in their deliberations on these matters.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Will the right hon. Gentleman keep in mind the fact that he is the Leader of the whole House, including Back Benchers? Does he realise that, if he is to keep the kind regard that many hon. Members have for him, he must be careful to prevent incidents such as the recent placing of a two-line Whip on the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill, which was a private measure, and of a three-line Whip against a private Member's Bill sponsored by one of his hon. Friends? In addition, he gave a rather curt reply to last night's debate—he has certainly softened a little this afternoon — which also infringed the rights of Back Benchers who want to be part of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. Such incidents do not build up the support that is necessary if the right hon. Gentleman is to follow in the great traditions of his predecessors.

Mr. Wakeham: I know that my immediate predecessor was a hard act to follow and I shall do my best to serve the House in all capacities. However, the hon. Gentleman has not got his facts right on the earlier matters to which he referred, and that rather devalues his contribution. Matters of whipping are not matters for me or matters for discussion. I had a very few minutes in which to reply to the debate last night. I believe that we had a useful and satisfactory debate and that the way in which I proceeded will meet with the general satisfaction of the House.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Is my right hon. Friend aware that every year, immediately before our debate on Hong Kong — my right hon. Friend announced this year's debate today—the Hong Kong media seem to regard it as necessary to whip up massive expectations of world-shattering announcements about to be made by the British Government. Will he make it quite clear that this is a routine annual debate, albeit an important one, and anybody expecting dramatic announcements from the Government as a result of it is likely to be disappointed?

Mr. Wakeham: The debate is likely t

make representations directly to Ministers on immigration matters? Will he therefore arrange for an early statement from the Home Secretary so that he can be questioned on the Government's intentions in this matter? Will he ensure that the debate that is due to take place the week after next about the immigration rules is given sufficient time to enable all hon. Members to raise the issue of their ability to make representations directly to Ministers on immigration matters?

Mr. Wakeham: I can confirm that I shall be announcing a debate on these matters in my next business statement. That will be the occasion to deal with the points that the hon. Gentleman has raised. I shall ensure that there are discussions through the usual channels to ensure adequate time for that debate.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): When my right hon. Friend reflects on last night's debate about the setting up of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, will he bear in mind the two themes that emerged—that there should be such a Select Committee and that its conduct in the last Parliament was widely thought to be unsatisfactory? Is there not an obvious answer to the problem — the Committee of Selection should nominate only those hon. Members who do not serve Scottish constituencies?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend adds a novel twist to an already fairly complicated position.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): When can we have a debate on the special needs of special schools such as Western Park school in my constituency, where the combination of the reductions in funds for education and for health have combined to make life extremely difficult for the people who are trying to care for those children and for the youngsters themselves, especially in physiotherapy?

Mr. Wakeham: Subject to you, Mr. Speaker, it seems that some of the points that the hon. Gentleman wishes to make could be made in the debate next week.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Has my right hon. Friend had time to consider the serious events in the Chamber on Monday? Is he aware that the hon. Member involved in the incident announced on radio the same day that, because of the short term of his suspension from the House, he proposes, if necessary and as he sees fit, to repeat the episode? Therefore, will my right hon. Friend allow an early debate on the procedures of the House, particularly on the disciplinary measures available to the Speaker, in order that any repetition of such an event is met with much more harsh discipline than was the case on Monday?

Mr. Wakeham: If there were a strong demand for a debate, I would look into it. The position was pretty clear earlier in the week, and I think all hon. Members hope that we do not have a repetition of that sort of thing.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): May I add my congratulations to the right hon. Gentleman, for whom I have had the warmest regard over many years, since we first travelled abroad together? I know him better than most. When can the right hon. Gentleman arrange that we should have a chance to debate foreign affairs again, because there are a number of very important issues that many of us would like to examine, such as the appalling conduct of the Israeli Government and its army in the middle east, the developments in central America and the continuing appalling situation in South Africa? I agree that these are all major matters that the should be considering fairly soon?

Mr. Wakeham: The high regard of which th Gentleman spoke is reciprocated, but that does no that I can find an extra day in an otherwise c programme in the next few weeks to debate foreign It is certainly an important subject and we will have a debate before long, but it will not be immediate future.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Does n hon. Friend agree that it is welcome news th Treasury will authorise the minting of a £2 coin nex Nonetheless, will he agree to a debate on the nature denominations of coins to be minted and issued a design to be imposed upon them?

Mr. Wakeham: A special tercentenary coin minted. I recognise that a debate on the subject more interesting and enlightening than some deba have, but I do not think that I can promise a deb that subject in the immediate future.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): Wou Leader of the House find time to debate the patrona appointments by Ministers? I am thinking of the L health board, where appointments have been syste ally removed and replaced by card-carrying memb the Conservative party. When I was speaking to the in Edinburgh this morning, one of them openly sp himself as being an agent of the Minister. T unacceptable and cannot go on.

Mr. Wakeham: I obviously cannot comment o particular case the hon. Gentleman raises. My impre after a few years as Patronage Secretary, is that su candidates from whatever political party are hard t for many jobs in public life. It would be more constr for all of us to put forward suitable candidates th criticise those who put themselves forward for service.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Will my right Friend, notwithstanding next week's Opposition deb the Health Service, seek to bring a Minister here to a statement on the current position over meningitis? is causing great anxiety and many hon. Member surprised that a Minister has not already come t Dispatch Box to air the Government's position o subject. Will my right hon. Friend look into it?

Mr. Wakeham: I certainly recognise that this impo subject is giving concern. I will refer the matter to my hon. Friend to see whether any statement woul appropriate.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Woul Leader of the House take time to persuade his right Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to come to Dispatch Box, because today on two occasions a Trea Minister and the Prime Minister were pressed comments made in Europe by Lord Cockfield on extension of VAT? This afternoon we have rece assurances on fuel oils, children's clothes, food, and s but it is remarkable that we have not received such assurance on books and newspapers. Perhaps the Le of the House can persuade the Chancellor to reassur that there are no proposals to impose VAT on books newspapers.

Mr. Wakeham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his question. I assure him that I can deliver my right hon. Friend the Chancellor very shortly, but what he will say is a matter for him, not for me.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Could my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the tremendous damage being done to democracy by the sight of the squalid squabbling among the various factions of the alliance? Is it not true that, when the alliance was formed, its members told us that they would promulgate a new type of consensus politics? Is it not becoming apparent that it is not consensus politics that they are pushing forward, but nonsense politics?

Mr. Wakeham: I shall not delve too far into those waters. I shall merely say that I understand that the squabbling is not about how to divide up the Short money.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Does the Leader of the House recognise that there is considerable concern about the possible extension of privatisation to the provision of leisure and recreation services by local authorities? Will he give the House an assurance that, if the Government are tempted to move in that direction, the subject will be fully debated in the House, and not sneaked through and added to the Local Government Bill by other means?

Mr. Wakeham: I have no doubt that any proposals from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment would be well worthy of debate in the House, and that he would welcome an opportunity of explaining his views. However, I do not think that I can add anything to the answer that I gave to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): Will my right hon. Friend consider finding time for a debate on the report from the Foreign Affairs Select Committee on cultural diplomacy? Is he aware of the concern on both sides of the House about the funding and the administration of the British Council, which is so important to our influence and our exports abroad?

Mr. Wakeham: That is an important matter, and the report by the Select Committee is also important. However, I am afraid that the pressure of time is such that I cannot offer any prospect of a debate in the immediate future.

Mr. Pat Wall (Bradford, North): As the Leader of the House has already said that changes are to be proposed in the rights of hon. Members to represent their constituents in immigration cases, can he ensure that a statement is made in the House next week — the week before the debate? This is yet another attack on the rights of hon. Members to represent their constituents.

Mr. Wakeham: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman's analysis of the position is accurate. The reason that we are having a debate not next week but the week after is that that was found to be more convenient for both sides of the House.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Following the very eloquent question from my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth), may I make a strong demand of my right hon. Friend that we should have a debate on that subject? My right hon. Friend will be aware that, on Monday, a hitherto totally unknown Member of the House, whom no one had clapped eyes on before, managed by appalling behavi ejected from the premises and projecte our television screens.

This bad behaviour is increasing. wants to be a martyr, there should penalty; a little risk; a little bit of pain be burnt at the stake on the Floor of the my right hon. Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the str Friend's argument, and I would gues people think like him. However, I think would be controversial. It is a matter f as I have said, if there is a strong wish see what I can do. We should, howeve the fact that any hon. Member who h from the House is not relieved of al duties. Such matters, of course, would implications for you, Mr. Speaker.

Miss Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): C the House clarify his response to a ques the hon. Member for Havant (Sir I. chance of an early debate on the Departm Industry? It is very important to interested in investing in the north-east, inward investment, to know what grant the future.

reported in England? If so, will he confirm that the matter can be debated in tomorrow's debate? If it is not raised tomorrow, will it be included in the Government's thinking in their White Paper on these sensitive and delicate matters?

Mr. Wakeham: What will or will not be in order in tomorrow's debate is not a matter for me. However, I should have thought that my hon. Friend, with the skill that he shows in such matters, might be able to make some of the points that he wants to make in principle.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Has the Leader of the House reflected on early-day motions 228, 253, 272, 273 and 286?

[That this House notes that in the book, Campaign, By Rodney Tyler, the Selling of the Prime Minister; from behind the doors of Downing Street and Conservative Central Office—A unique inside account of the Battle for Power, the author on page 1, chapter 1, paragraph 1, sentence 1, states 'It was an extraordinary turnaround in fortunes from the moment on 27th January 1986 when Mrs. Thatcher secretly confided to a close associate that she might have to resign . . .' and on page 3 that 'On the eve of the crucial Westland debate she herself felt shaky enough to doubt her future' though some around her later sought to dismiss this as late evening anxieties of the sort that had disappeared the following morning. It is certainly true that if Leon Brittan had chosen to, he could have brought her to the brink of downfall, by naming the real culprits inside Number 10. [That this House notes that in his book Mrs. Thatcher's Revolution, published this week by Jonathan Cape and Co., Mr. Peter Jenkins writes, on page 200 'Brittan himself refused to enlighten the Select Committee on any point of substance. However at that time, the downfall of Heseltine had not been achieved . . . He (Mr. Brittan) might point the finger at her (Mrs. Thatcher). Potentially he now had the power to destroy her'; and calls on the Prime Minister to give the House a full account of her conversations with the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the Right honourable Member for Richmond, Yorks, over the period from 3rd January and 27th January 1986, in relation to the selectively leaked Law Officer's letter concerning the Westland Affair.]

In relation to what was said to my hon. F Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling record that some of us have had nothing but court four Conservative Secretaries of State: Michae Jack Maclay, Gordon Campbell and, indeed, hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger)? Howev have changed in Scotland, and Ministers now throw people off health boards and other Gov committees for the Secretary of State, which h happened before—good Labour people who hav well.

That is partly the reason why—uncharacter perhaps—for the first time ever, I have been questions about one of the right hon. Gen colleagues, the Under-Secretary of State for Sco the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord Douglas-Hamilton)—who, absolutely without pr announced that he had an interest in a very contr and contentious Bill: the Housing (Scotland) Bill. whether, on Monday of next week, it would be pr a statement to be made from the Government Fron —as the Selection Committee has put the ball Government's court—clarifying the role on the S Committee of a Minister who declares an interest i contentious legislation.

Is it proper that such a Minister should lead on, a major force in, such a controversial Bill? considered that he should remain on the Committee we have a statement on whether etiquette, and, I Government rules, have changed? This has happened before in my 25 years in the House.

Mr. Wakeham: I am only prepared to answer part of that question. In answer to the first part, nothing to add to what I have said earlier. My hon. the Under-Secretary himself raised his interests debate. He took the necessary steps to check whet was conducting himself in the best traditions of the House and ministerial practice, and I am sure that he is doing exactly that.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that, before Christmas, I asked for an early statement about Government concern regarding job discrimination in Northern Ireland and that he gave an unfavourable reply? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, in view of the imminent election in the United States, American politicians are coming under increased pressure to support the MacBride principles and that that would lead to further reductions in investment and perhaps disinvestment in Northern Ireland? In view of that pressure, is the Minister now prepared to ensure an early statement from the Government so that American opinion can be reassured and so that we can have further investment in the Province and ensure higher employment levels there?

Mr. Waketham: This is obviously an important matter, and I referred it to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. My right hon. Friend and his colleagues spend a lot of time encouraging investment from the United States and other places. If they feel that a statement would be helpful on this matter, I am sure that they will want to make one.

Autumn Statement

4.14 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): I beg to move,

That this House approves the Autumn Statement presented by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer on 3rd November 1987; welcomes the prospect of continuing low inflation and steady growth as the basis for maintaining the trend of rising employment; and congratulates Her Majesty's Government on the continuing reduction in the share of national income pre-empted by public expenditure.

Mr. Speaker: I must tell the House that a large number of right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part in the debate—no fewer than eight Privy Councillors. I do not subscribe wholly to the way in which the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) put his question to the Leader of the House today, but I would say to the House, and to Privy Councillors, that short speeches should be the order of the day if we are to ensure that more Back Benchers can be called. The Chair has—as yet—no authority to limit speeches to 10 minutes, but if speeches take about that time most of those on the list will be called.

I announce to the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Lawson: The Autumn Statement debate this year is a little later than it has been in previous years. Part of the reason was to allow the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, which was established only on 24 November, to prepare its report. I believe that that delay was also for the convenience of the Opposition. I sympathise with the Committee's frustration that it was not constituted sooner and I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and his colleagues on producing their report as promptly as they did.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): The right hon. Gentleman referred to the convenience of the Opposition. In case such ideas gain some currency, let me make it quite clear that we were asked whether we thought it would be a good idea for the Select Committee to report. We assented to that. That is the only way in which it was convenient to us and in that respect it was convenient to the Government and everyone else, so what is the Chancellor's point?

Mr. Lawson: I am glad that the right hon. and learned Gentleman agrees with what I said.

In my Budget statement last March I warned that:

"the biggest risk to the excellent prospect I have outlined is that of a downturn in the world economy as a whole. There are still serious imbalances afflicting the three major economies—the United States, on the one hand, and Japan and Germany on the other — which, if not handled properly, could lead to a simultaneous downturn in all three. And this in turn could be exaggerated by renewed turmoil in the foreign exchange markets, whose tendency to overshoot is as notorious as it is damaging."—[Official Report, 17 March 1987; Vol. 112, c. 817.]

Recent events have brought those concerns very much to the fore, and I therefore propose to devote most of my remarks today to the prospects for the world economy —not least because this may be my last opportunity to do so before this year's Budget statement, which, I can now tell the House, will be on 15 March. The important issue of public expenditure will, therefore, be dealt with by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, w to wind up this debate, if he is fortunate, M catch your eye.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Bef from the subject of public expenditure, whi is to be dealt with by his colleague, does th take on board the sort of feelings that have b up and down the country in the past few certainly in the past few weeks, which is th cash crisis in the National Health Service, choice between more money for the NH essential services or continuing tax cuts, it s former that has priority? Does the Chancel the strength of feeling, even among Conserv on that issue?

Mr. Lawson: When I appeared befor Committee on the Treasury and Civil Servic the hon. Gentleman is a member—I recall t had a discussion on that matter. I do not pr into that matter any further today because I directly about the world economy. My right the Chief Secretary will deal with public expe in particular, I am sure that he will deal with the course of his speech.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): Does m Friend agree that, although the Governme income tax, tax yields have risen?

Mr. Lawson: That is quite correct.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, Soutl

Mr. Lawson: I cannot give way again. I re few moments ago, Mr. Speaker pointed out t number of right hon. and hon. Members wish in the debate. I do not believe that it is fair o prolong my remarks by giving way more tha amount of times.

I presented my Autumn Statement to the H two weeks after the collapse of the world's sto that has come to be known as Black Apprehension about the prospects for the worl at that time was at its most acute. It was widel that the equity market collapse would inevitabl major world recession this year.

Two months on, it is easier to put the sharp stock market in October into some perspective. the scale and suddenness of the fall were unpr it has increasingly been seen as in large r correction, following the rapid rise in the ear 1987. In the three main markets—London, N and Tokyo—following the sharp falls in Octo prices have not fallen any further since the en month, and are at much the same levels as a yea impact on consumer spending — the so-calle effect"—should therefore be limited.

But a shock such as the stock market col readily damage business confidence quite sever of the major countries therefore acted promptly interest rates, both to deal with the immediate lack of liquidity and to sustain business confide sure that, in the circumstances of that time, that

A further reason why business confidence has pretty well intact is that all the economic published since October, so far from implying th recession is imminent, suggests that the world

prior to the stock market collapse was in fact markedly stronger than had earlier been recognised. So any slowdown there may be this year will be from a pretty vigorous momentum of growth.

It is now clear that activity picked up markedly during the course of 1987. Taking the seven major industrialised countries as a whole, output in the third quarter of the year was more than 3 per cent. higher than a year earlier, with industrial production in October more than 4 per cent. up. In the United States, industrial production in the third quarter of 1987 was 5 per cent. up on a year earlier, and unemployment reached its lowest level since 1979. Japan, the world's second largest economy, which had earlier been a little sluggish, began to move ahead briskly, with industrial production at the latest count some 8 per cent. higher than a year ago. The United Kingdom, as I indicated in the Autumn Statement, looks to have enjoyed 4 per cent. growth over last year as a whole, with again the third quarter stronger than the first two. The Canadian economy, too, is buoyant. It is only the performance of continental Europe, and particularly Germany, which remains disappointing, though even there modest growth is continuing.

Thus, overall, world growth has been proving extremely robust. However, the serious imbalances in the world economy remain.

At the heart of those imbalances lies the huge structural budget deficit in the United States. That is particularly damaging, not just because of the enormous size of the United States economy, but because the Americans, with their low propensity to save, have proved wholly unable to finance the deficit entirely from domestic savings. This means, inevitably, that the United States requires large capital inflows from overseas, with the counterpart, so long as this state of affairs persists, of a large current account deficit.

For years, there were calls for the United States to reduce its budget deficit—except, I have to say, from the Opposition Front Bench, which urged us to emulate it. But not nearly enough progress was made, not least because of the difficulty of reaching any sort of agreement between the Administration and the Congress on how to go about it. Indeed, I was interested to see that President Reagan himself said earlier this week:

> "That deficit is an embarrassment and a shame—most dangerous, perhaps, because it signals the complete breakdown of one of the most basic functions of the United States Government."

There has now been some encouraging progress, with the legislation passed just before Christmas to reduce the deficit, relative to the level it would otherwise have been, by $30 billion for 1988 and $45 billion for 1989. But these steps, welcome though they are, will not be sufficient, by themselves, to reduce the deficit to a tolerable level.

It has been clear for some time that the reduction of the other set of imbalances—the current account imbalances—will depend on domestic demand in the United States growing more slowly than that in Japan and Germany for some years to come. One of the prime objectives of the major industrialised countries, meeting together in the Group of Seven, has been to achieve this in an orderly way. The United States action, and the decision of the German authorities to reduce their key discount rate from 3 per cent. to 2½ per cent., the lowest rate they have had since the war, are helpful steps, and paved the way for the G7 communiqué issued on 23 December.

That communiqué also re-emphasised the agreement to co-operate to foster exchange rate stability, following a period of turbulence on the foreign exchanges which had seen a further slide in the dollar.

Wild gyrations in exchange rates can create grave uncertainty and damage business confidence throughout the world. Companies in all countries find it more difficult to plan for the future, and have to spend precious time, money and ingenuity on insuring themselves against exchange rate risks, when they should be concentrating on the real job of improving company performance. That is one of the main reasons why the CBI, for example, has stressed the importance to its members of a stable exchange rate.

It is thus natural that countries should seek to act together to prevent excessive exchange rate volatility. Moreover, history has shown that a readiness by countries to commit themselves to some form of exchange rate stability is the only feasible way of securing wider international co-operation on economic policy.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): I am most grateful to the Chancellor for giving way. There is a paradox in what he is saying. He is talking about robust economic growth, which he is extrapolating from one quarter's figures for several countries, before the stock market crash. What are his comments on the OECD forecast for a slow-down in European OECD countries to 1·5 per cent. of GDP by 1989? Does he recognise that United States growth will have slowed down from about 3 per cent. a year in 1985 to not much more than 1·5 per cent. in 1989?

While exchange rate stability is an objective in itself, it is the volume effect on demand for United States exports that will be crucial. What action will the Chancellor take, with other Finance Ministers, to get spending going in the global economy, which is the real basis for the recovery of the United States' trade and payments deficit?

Mr. Lawson: Clearly I should not have given way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Holland: Answer the question.

Mr. Lawson: As I have said on a number of occasions, there is likely to be some slowing down of world economic growth this year but it is a slowing down from a considerably higher level than was earlier recognised—the level in 1987. Far from there being any of the dangers that the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) mentioned, the policies he advocates would simply lead to a resurgence of inflation.

If countries are indeed prepared to accept wholeheartedly the exchange rate commitments to which I was referring before that rather lengthy and inconsequential intervention, they will find themselves obliged to pursue domestic policies which are consistent with their exchange rate objectives. That applies most obviously to monetary policy, though fiscal policy also has a vital supporting role, particularly over the medium term. It is, however, an academic dream, divorced from reality, to imagine that sovereign states will be persuaded into consistent domestic policies simply by a process of careful international analysis and discussion.

Of course, countries may choose at any time to ignore the implications of the exchange rate arrangements they have entered into. Sovereign states cannot, in the end, be required to take particular courses of action. But if they are not prepared to play their part in an agreement with the visible, measurable, objective of broad exchange rate stability, within a framework of low inflation—I stress the necessity of that framework — it is hopelessly unrealistic to imagine that a more general agreement on consistency of fiscal and monetary policy would stand any chance at all of working. Those who suggest otherwise are not living in the real world.

Let me be quite clear. I am not suggesting a return to anything like the rigid exchange rate system that applied under Bretton Woods, which contained the seeds of its own destruction. But I believe that there are clear advantages in a more managed approach designed to prevent the wild gyrations of recent years, particularly in the dollar, and in so doing achieving greater international co-operation in economic policy more generally.

The events of recent years underline the point. It is most unlikely that the heady rise in the dollar during 1984 would have taken place if there had been an exchange rate agreement at the time, and the United States authorities had thus been obliged to give greater weight to the external value of the dollar in the conduct of their monetary and fiscal policy. Had that been so, the imbalances that plague us today, and the protectionist threat that accompanies them, could never have developed to the extent that they have.

Since the United States became converted in 1985 to the desirability of co-operation on exchange rates, we have had the Plaza agreement in September 1985, designed to deal directly with the problem of dollar over-valuation, and over the following 15 months we saw an orderly, but substantial, depreciation. The Louvre accord, signed in February of last year, provided a period of broad stability, intended to allow the major economies to adjust to the massive exchange rate changes that had already taken place.

A number of commentators have seized on the decline in the dollar that has occurred since October to suggest that the Louvre accord was fundamentally flawed, and thus unsustainable, from the outset. I have to say that I disagree. As Paul Volcker observed in a speech in Geneva in November:

"The argument of some seems to be that the agreement sacrificed appropriate internal economic management to the requirements of a stable exchange rate. That seems to me a misreading of both the nature of the understanding and, more broadly, the need to accord the requirements of exchange rate stability more prominence in economic policy-making."

I was pleased to note, too, that the Select Committee said in its report—and I quote:

"give weight to ensuring reasonable stability of exchange rates which was the original intention of the Louvre agreement."

It is of course clear, and this is implicit in both the Plaza and Louvre agreements, that stability of exchange rates cannot be achieved simply by wishing that it were so. Appropriate domestic policies—fiscal and in particular monetary — are required. For a period, the Louvre accord brought the necessary results—stable exchange rates, greatly helped by the fact that interest rates in the United States rose, and those in Japan and Germany edged down.

What brought that period of stability to an end was the perception in the market that the Americans were no longer committed to the Louvre agreement, and were simply concerned to prevent any risk of domestic recession as they saw it. The markets were also aware that, after commendable progress in fiscal 1987, the United States looked unlikely to reduce its budget deficit for fiscal 1988 by anything like the extent agreed at the Louvre.

During November and December, therefore, the dollar appeared to be given little weight in United States policy, with the inevitable result of turmoil on the foreign exchanges, with the dollar falling and expected by many to fall further. Last week, however, the United States authorities demonstrated a renewed commitment to supporting the dollar, with the Federal Reserve bank intervening, in concert with other central banks, to a very much greater extent, and doing so in a deliberately public way. This ending of a brief but damaging phase of so-called benign neglect is a step in the right direction, but it is idle to suppose that official intervention on its own, even when it is co-ordinated internationally and involves full United States participation, amounts to a coherent policy.

But intervention is an important tactical weapon, and it would be foolish not to use it when appropriate. In our own case, it has helped us to achieve a remarkable degree of stability for sterling, particularly against the deutschmark — something that is widely welcomed by British industry — and in the process to build up our foreign exchange reserves to an adequate level.

The desire at the Louvre to allow time for the exchange rate changes to have their effect on trade imbalances is equally important now. The financial markets were perhaps surprisingly slow to wake up to the imbalances in the world economy, but when they did, they showed signs of impatience at the slowness of the adjustment.

In fact, important changes are taking place. Although the published United States trade deficit has shown very little improvement so far the volume figures have moved very substantially: for example, in the year to the third quarter of 1987, exports had risen by 15 per cent., whereas imports were up by only 6 per cent.

As many of us had warned, there was bound to be a lag before these developments fed through to the current account — the well known J-curve. Repeated dollar depreciations, so far from speeding up the adjustment of the current account, can only add to the length of the J-curve. This is particularly the case if, at the same time, domestic activity is not adequately reined back.

Looking forward to the prospects for 1988, it is clear that there remain very real risks in the outlook for the world economy. While there is no immediate prospect of recession, the substantial dollar depreciation could lead to serious inflationary pressures in the United States and there still remains the threat of creeping protectionism, which could at any time escalate into a trade war.

However, the current strength of the world economy, which I illustrated earlier, does give us a breathing space in which to get the world economy on to a more sustainable footing. Some of the necessary steps have already been taken, but more action needs to follow. We must get the right policies in place, and pursue them with patience and determination, because there are bound to be periods of difficulty which we shall have to ride out. Provided we can do that, although there may be some slowdown in world economic growth, I am confident we can avoid the twin dangers of inflation and recession.

Clearly, we in Britain cannot wholly insulate ourselves from developments overseas, and we should not imagine otherwise. But subject to those inevitable uncertainties, it is clear that the British economy is well placed to continue the excellent progress of recent years in spite of the problems faced by many other countries and the turbulence in the financial markets.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): The Chancellor has emphasised the importance of exchange rate stability and the dependence of exchange rates upon the fundamentals, but he has said that it is not realistic to expect different Governments to agree about wider economic matters within their domestic economies. Can he reconcile those three statements?

Mr. Lawson: Yes, indeed. This has been the lesson of history. What I said was that the wider co-operation that has occurred has been a result of the acceptance by the major countries of an external discipline. The gold standard was a good example; it operated successfully for a long time. That is the point which I was seeking to make, and am I sorry that the hon. Gentleman failed to understand it.

Britain's strength is clear to the OECD, which forecasts that in 1988 we shall once again be among the fastest growing of the major industrial nations. It is clear to the many thousands of companies from overseas which are coming to invest in Britain. It is clear to those who run industry—take, for example, the American chairman of British Oxygen, Mr. Richard Giordano, who said last year:

"In the last half dozen years, Britain has done a pretty good job. If I was a company having to set up in Europe, it is Britain I would choose."

And it is clear, of course, to the British people, as they demonstrated in the general election only eight months ago.

In fact, the strength of the economy is clear to everybody except to the Opposition. Their problem is that they are so wedded to living in the past that they cannot accept that the policies we are following, which are precisely the reverse of those they followed when they were in office, can possibly have led to the success we see around us.

When it became clear that growth in 1987 was moving well ahead of the already strong trend of the past five years, the Opposition put it down to a short-lived pre-election boom. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) is not here. Being of New Zealand origin he may, I hope, have gone back to his native land to learn an excellent lesson from the policies being pursued by the Labour Government in New Zealand. They could certainly teach him a lot. Anyhow, last February he spoke of the "irresponsible and profligate spending boom which the Chancellor hopes will sweep him to a general election victory".—[Official Report, 18 February 1987; Vol. 110, c. 942.]

I am glad that the Opposition accept that we had a sweeping victory. I have to tell the hon. Member for Dagenham and his hon. Friends that growth in the period since the general election has, if anything, been stronger than it was before the election, and further non-oil growth —less rapid than in 1987, but still in excess of anything ever achieved under the Labour Government — seems likely in 1988.

The Opposition put the alleged pre-election boom down to higher consumer spending. Again, they are barking up the wrong tree. Growth in 1987 was stronger than in 1986 precisely because investment growth pick up and exports increased more rapidly than in the previo year, in the aftermath of the oil price collapse.

The Opposition also claimed that this so-called p election boom would be instantly reversed. In the l Autumn Statement debate, which I looked at just befo coming to the Chamber, the right hon. Member f Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) made one his justly notorious predictions:

"An election victory would be followed by a massi increase in taxation", he alleged. He went on:

"There would be more public expenditure cuts."
[Official Report, 17 December 1986; Vol. 107, c. 1253.]

He has now had his answer on public expenditure in t clearest possible terms, with the substantial increas announced in the Autumn Statement. Whether he w right or wrong about taxation, of course, remains to seen, but he will only have to wait now for another tw months, until 15 March, for the massive increase taxation which he so confidently predicted, if indeed the is one.

Meanwhile, having warned of a dangerous boom, t Opposition have now reverted to their normal cry th higher borrowing and lower interest rates—an unlike combination, if ever there was one—are needed to sta off impending recession.

It was once said that Wall Street had correctly foreca 13 out of the last five recessions. The Opposition ha done even better, because they predicted recession in ea and every one of the last six years, and in each and eve case they have been wrong. The trouble is that all the o beliefs that they have clung to in spite of the accumulati evidence are being finally and definitively disproved. The believe that economic growth depends on ever high public spending, paid for by higher borrowing and high taxes, and on easy money. They should look at wh happened last year. Public borrowing, even leaving asi privatisation proceeds, looks like turning out at the lowe level since 1970-71. Interest rates, as the Oppositio themselves point out, are, if anything, a little above th international average, yet we have seen the stronge period of sustained growth since the war.

For some time the Opposition justified their attachme to higher borrowing by reference to the experience of th United States. The whole House, and certainly my ho Friends, will recall the right hon. Member the Leader o the Opposition urging the Government to borrow on massive scale and saying:

"They cannot even see the lesson of the United State economy when it is staring them in the face".—[Offici Report, 31 July 1984; Vol. 65, c. 236.]

It is now all too clear who got the wrong lesson. With hi unerring instinct for backing a loser, the right ho Member made the keystone of his party's economic polic what has turned out to be the Americans' undoing—a excessive budget deficit.

Right hon. and hon. Members of the Oppositio completely failed to appreciate the real reasons for th rapid creation of new jobs in the United States. The ignored the role played by the low tax burden. The ignored the importance of labour market flexibility an low wage increases, which contribute so much to the fac that unemployment in the United States is lower than i any major country in western Europe. They completel failed to appreciate the importance of deregulation and of the enterprise economy. As usual they got the wrong end of every stick.

The short point is this. A successful economy cannot be created by the Government pumping in money. It depends on the performances of businesses and the individuals at all levels who work in them. That is what led to the outstanding performance in Britain in 1987. That is what has given us an upswing of unprecedented length, strength and steadiness. That is what enables us to look forward to the future with confidence.

The most telling example of the transformation in British industry is to be found in manufacturing. The Opposition, of course, always paint a gloomy picture of British manufacturing as an industry in terminal decline, in contrast with what they allege to have been a golden age under their stewardship. Nothing could be further from the truth, and I will give the figures for 1979.

The plain fact is that manufacturing output fell over Labour's period in office whereas during our whole period of office since 1979 it has risen. But the contrast goes far beyond that, because the underlying strength of British manufacturing industry has been transformed. Britain's manufacturers have increased their profitability for five years in succession, the best performance for a generation.

Does the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) wish to intervene? He will have his chance in a moment, anyway.

Mr. John Smith: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for encouraging me to ask the obvious question. He said that he wanted to be judged by output. Can he tell us by how much manufacturing output has increased since 1979, after eight years of Conservative Government?

Mr. Lawson: The point that I am making is such a simple one that even the right hon. and learned Member ought to understand it. It is that during the whole of the Opposition's period of office manufacturing output fell, and during the whole of our period in office it has risen. That is clear to everybody, even the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

In the past, strong growth of the kind we have seen would undoubtedly have quickly fed through into much higher inflation. In fact, although prices in 1987 rose somewhat faster than in 1986, as the one-off benefit of the oil price fall was lost, inflation remained low throughout the year. At the same time unemployment fell rapidly. Today's figures—which I am sure the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East will want to welcome as soon as he gets up to speak—show that during 1987 as a whole the number of people out of work fell by more than half a million—the biggest fall on record, with the rate falling far faster than in any other major country over the same period.

In the Autumn Statement, I forecast that growth in 1988 would be 2¼ per cent. for the economy as a whole, with the non-oil economy growing at 3 per cent. I shall, of course, be making another forecast in the Budget and I do not intend to make one today. However, on the question of the non-oil economy, which is critical for new jobs, let me just say this. Growth of 3 per cent. for the non-oil economy in 1988, although slower than last year, would be a thoroughly creditable performance. The Labour Government never once achieved 3 per cent. growth, with or without oil. Indeed, it was only achieved once in the whole of the 1970s, yet we have achieved that rate of growth in four out of the last five years.

Keeping the economy on track involves keeping a constant watch on all the indicators of how the economy is developing and then taking action as necessary. I have never hesitated to act in the past when I have judged that there was a risk to our inflation objectives. I can assure the House that I shall not hesitate to do so in future. It is precisely by acting promptly that we have been able to avoid the need for drastic and destabilising lurches in policy. Our track record speaks for itself.

We enter 1988 with the British economy in good shape and the public finances sounder than at any time since the war. That is no coincidence. When we came to office in 1979 we gave the highest priority to restoring the public finances to a sound and sustainable condition. That is one of the rocks on which the new strength of the economy has been built. Thanks to that achievement, we have been able to choose to increase public spending, especially in priority areas, while continuing to reduce overall public spending as a share of gross domestic product. Unlike the Opposition when they were in office, we have been able to sustain our policy year in, year out.

The Opposition, of course, are brimful of ideas for spending ever higher amounts of the taxpayer's money, and no doubt we shall hear more of them today. The plain fact is that, had their policies been implemented, the money simply would not have been there in the first place. It was certainly not there in the 1970s, and it would not have been there in the 1980s either.

The Autumn Statement which we are debating today, my first in this Parliament, embodies the consistent strategy that we have been pursuing since 1979. I commend it to the House.

4.48 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'regrets that the Autumn Statement fails to provide adequate resources for the vital public services and the people who need them, particularly the National Health Service which consequently faces further under-funding next year, and, despite a deteriorating situation in the balance of trade and balance of payments and unsettled international economic relationships, does not propose measures to strengthen manufacturing industry and science and technology, promote vigorous regional development, or significantly reduce unemployment'.

I suppose that it is not unusual for this Chancellor of the Exchequer to dodge the main issue in the debate, but we should remind him that the debate is about the Autumn Statement. Although it is interesting to hear his views on the world economy, and although it is important that we should discuss that matter, among other things, one would have expected a Chancellor of the Exchequer who had proposed the Autumn Statement — this is the first opportunity which the House has had formally to debate it—to defend and argue for the propositions contained in this crucial statement of the pattern of public expenditure. However, the Chancellor is fulfilling his promise that he would not say a word about it. He said that he would leave it to his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, who, of course, will be the last speaker in the debate, so there will be no opportunity for any hon. Member to hear the Government's views about the Autumn Statement until the wind-up speech. That does not seem to be the action of a Chancellor who is confident of his ability to defend the propositions that he put forward in his Autumn Statement.

[Mr. John Smith]

Labour Members conceive their role to be slightly different. We shall probe the underlying issues in the Autumn Statement and invite the Government to defend some of the conclusions that emerged from it. However, before I do that, I have to comment on the fact that we have had to endure once again the commonplace of speeches by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the British economy, under his beneficent stewardship, is in a condition of near perfection. If I exaggerate, it can be only slightly, because the Chancellor never misses an opportunity to say how difficult things are in the rest of the world but how well-managed they are here in the United Kingdom.

I have a purpose in making that statement. To put it mildly, the Chancellor's claim is a matter of dispute. A glance at the balance of trade figures, particularly the prognosis for the balance of payments, which, typically, the Chancellor once again ignored, would soon jolt back to reality anyone who might temporarily have succumbed to the public relations hype which the Government substitute for serious policy discussion and presentation.

To elucidate some of the important issues on the public expenditure front, let me, for the purposes of argument, if for nothing else, assume that the Government are correct in their claims for the economy. Let us assume that the economy is stong and that the nation is prosperous. Let us assume also that, as every economic commentator predicts, the Chancellor will, by 15 March—the ides of March—have £3 billion to £4 billion at his disposal. Some commentators put the amount higher than others, but all agree that that figure is roughly correct. It would be fair for the purposes of argument to proceed on that assumption.

Let us consider public expenditure in that context, particularly spending on the National Health Service. I hope that the House does not need to be reminded of the crisis in our Health Service. The Government's first response to the crisis was to deny that it existed. Day after day, particularly during and after questions to the Prime Minister, from about the time of the Autumn Statement until quite recently, there was an endless barrage of statistics from the Prime Minister. Most people waiting for treatment and their relatives who could not find treatment in our hospitals, particularly in the acute services, found those statistics pretty wildly irrelevant to their problems and to their circumstances. They were irrelevant to the fact that there were empty wards because there were no trained nurses available to staff them. They were irrelevant to children who had to wait for serious heart operations.

The Government's first attempt was to deny that the problem existed. That attempt was increasingly undermined as a position which they could defend, as medical and nursing professions, appalled at the crisis that they knew existed in the service and strongly supported by a public who rely uniquely on the National Health Service for the prevention and cure of illness and disease, the alleviation of avoidable pain and the moderation of disability, made it crystal clear that the Government's presentation of the condition of the National H Service was in stark contrast to the reality encounter hospital wards.

Let us take just one manifestation of that conce the protest by the heads of the three royal medical coll They spoke out against what they described as breakdown of acute hospital services and the almost collapse of morale in hospitals. Yesterday, they at las the Secretary of State for Social Services. At long last, months of the campaign, the Government have adm that there will be a need to increase the total reso available to the National Health Service. I hope that means that we shall have an amendment to the prop in the Autumn Statement. Nothing was said about the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We would find statement made by the Secretary of State for S Services to the heads of the royal medical colleges a more convincing if he came to the House of Comm today and explained the financial changes that Government are prepared to make, following assurances that they apparently gave to those se medical figures yesterday. We shall wait with interes hear the Chief Secretary spell out the increase in reso that the Government propose to make.

Let us accept that we have passed by the argument there is no need for more resources. Both sides of House agree that we urgently need more resources fo National Health Service.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North) rose—

Mr. Smith: I shall give way to the hon. Gentlema a moment.

This is where we come to the importance of assumptions about the economy. If the economy is str if the nation is prosperous, and if the Government hav billion at their disposal, what on earth is to stop t spending it on the National Health Service? We know it is not a matter of resources not being available political choice is being made and the Government calculating whether to spend the money on tax cuts o the National Health Service.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: Given the desire for an incr in resources, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman exactly how many extra resources he would raise increasing taxation?

Mr. Smith: On a visit to St. Thomas's hospital on few days ago, the Leader of the Opposition gave a g response to the question asked by the hon. Gentlem The first step that we recommend should be taken is the underfunding of the hospital services commented in the unanimous report of the Select Committee on So Services—underfunding which existed for four years to 1986 and which would cost about £1·3 bill equivalent to about 1p on income tax, according to ready reckoner attached to the Autumn Statemen should be made good. That is a clear and spe commitment well within the range of what is available the Government.

As the hon. Gentleman asked me a straight quest and I gave him a straight answer, will he put the s question to the Government? Has he any confidence he will get as specific and direct an answer as I suppli I suppose that the hon. Gentleman must have been am the Tory Members canvassed in an opinion poll a months ago when the question was put to them: would they prefer the money to be spent on the National Health Service or given in tax cuts? A large majority of Conservative Members preferred tax cuts to spending on the National Health Service. I dare say that it might be more difficult to find hon. Members willing to admit that they accepted and defended that conclusion, after the events of the last few weeks, in view of the public concern about the National Health Service.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley) rose——

Mr. Smith: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman as, almost certainly, he will want tax cuts rather than more spending on the National Health Service.

Mr. Oppenheim: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell the House how much money would be needed to be put into the Health Service to ensure that anyone who could be treated was treated and that no one was kept waiting unnecessarily long for an operation? How much money would be needed to ensure that everyone could be treated, and how would he raise it?

Mr. Smith: It is a matter of great fascination to me that serious questions about funding the National Health Service are addressed to the Opposition and not to the Government. Even on the Conservative side of the House there is no belief in the sincerity of the Government's commitment to the National Health Service. Of course, enormous amounts of money could be spent on the National Health Service and Government after Government have said that they would always spend all the money that they would always want to spend on it, but we need to spend significantly more than the present Government are spending. A few months ago they told us that it did not need to be spent. They have been moved from that position by the outcry from the medical profession and the public. They have moved, but they have not yet moved financially. We have only about another £100 million on top of the several hundred million pounds of planned extra expenditure in the Autumn Statement and we have some way to go to obtain a better provision for the Health Service. But we now know that we shall be given the answer on 15 March when the Chancellor, who has £3 billion at his disposal, decides to spend the money either on the Health Service or on tax cuts. We shall then know clearly the Government's political priorities.

Part of the trouble about the Government's approach to public expenditure as a whole, and the NHS n particular, is that Ministers and Conservative Members have a less direct and personal contact with the public services than have the public whom they serve. We know that that is so in the case of the Health Service. When the Secretary of State for Social Services has to go into hospital, he goes into a private hospital. Many Conservative Members make use of the private education sector. But let them never forget that the vast majority of British people depend on public services for the standard of living and the quality of life that they enjoy.

It is disturbing that we are seeing the emergence of more rumblings from the Right wing of the Conservative party about changes in the NHS. I noticed in the press today that the hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who is regarded as some sort of significant intellectual figure on the Conservative Back Benches and in whom the Prime Minister until quite recently reposed the special trust of employing him in her special advisory unit, has issued another pamphlet about reforming, as he calls it, the NHS —he is quite prolific in giving his views—in which he calls the Health Service a monster. Indeed, he goes further and calls it an untamable monster. He recommends various new devices for privatising the Health Service.

That is so far away from the ordinary person's perception of the value of the Health Service that I would not bother with it were it not for the fact that such Right-wing extravaganzas, particularly in the area of privatisation, become official Government policy a few years later. We have learnt at our peril to pay attention to them when they first appear. But on that, as on all other matters to do with public services, the underlying philosophy of the Government is that public expenditure is somehow intrinsically not worthwhile but private expenditure is. Anyone with any common sense knows perfectly well that, whether expenditure is in the public or private sector, it should be evaluated according to the economic or social good which it can achieve.

I am not foolish enough to argue that all public expenditure is good in itself. I deplore—I do not know whether I will take Conservative Members with me—the amount of money that we spend on social security as a result of the unemployment that has been caused by the Conservative party. That is a heavy burden on the shoulders of the British taxpayer. I am not sure—here I am sure that I take my hon. Friends with me in their entirety — that expenditure on Trident is the best example of public expenditure. Nor, I hope, would all Conservative Members argue that all private expenditure is necessarily good, although some have more chance than others to do that. A sensible person would take the view that we should look at the proposed public expenditure to see whether it achieves good economic and social purposes. Under this Government, some credit is always to be taken if either the total of public expenditure or the proportion of public expenditure as part of the national account is falling.

We do not take that view, because to do so implies that there is something undesirable about the public expenditure involved. In the case of the NHS, we have already had to point that out to the Government. It has taken some time to establish—I hope that we have done so—some change of priorities by the Government. But the idea is spread that the fact that the NHS is publicly organised somehow means that it will be less efficiently organised than it would be if it were organised on a private basis. I see Conservative Members nodding, which means that they would prefer the NHS to become a private system on the view that it would somehow be better administered.

I simply do not understand how Conservative Members can hold that view when they look at the private medical system in the United States. Not only are 36 million Americans not covered by the health care in that country, but the cost of administration and bureaucracy are breaking the back of the system. We know that our NHS has to allocate about 2·6 per cent. of its budget to administration. I am sure that everybody would want to reduce that figure as much as possible, because every pound that is released from administration can be spent on care. There should be no argument or dispute about that. We want an efficient and well-directed Health Service. But the proportion spent on insurance, on collection, on arbitration of disputes and on bureaucratic organisation of the private health service in the United States is 5·3 per cent.—twice the cost of the NHS. So we argue that the NHS is not only social justice, but efficiency in action for the British people. That is why it is deeply rooted in their affections and interests. That is why the Government will have to retreat in the face of the outcry against the way in which they have handled it.

A similar approach runs through the whole of the Government's view on public expenditure. We see it not just in social expenditure but in public expenditure that is used to support the economy. I am thinking in particular of spending on science and technology, research and development, regional economic development, education and training. All need public expenditure, and that public expenditure is valuable capital investment in the British people and the future of our economy.

Let us look at the statement made earlier this week by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on the scrapping of regional development grant. In the usual way in which the Government go about their business we were told that that really does not mean much because in place of the automatic grant on which industry can rely at the moment in deciding whether to go to the north, south, west or east of the country, there is to be regional selective assistance. It is said that Ministers have made provision to spend as much by way of regional selective assistance as by way of regional development grant. We are invited to draw the conclusion that there has been no change in the objective of the policy, just a change in the means of achieving it.

There was what I can describe only as marked scepticism on the Opposition Benches at that presentation of the Government's policy. I doubt whether regional selective assistance will come remotely near the amount of money spent on regional development grants. The Government's fundamental purpose is to reduce the impact of regional economic policy, and certainly to reduce its cost. I see no signs of indignation on the faces of Ministers at that charge.

I think that I know how that will be achieved. It is typical of the Government's modus operandi to say that something has become selective and to manage matters so that the money will be reduced. Once something becomes selective, Ministers can refuse more applications than they grant. Then they will claim that expenditure has gone down because there has been less demand leading it forward.

We were given an interesting insight into the Government's approach by the way in which the Department of Trade and Industry administered the innovation and hi-tech investment grant. It was revealed in a memorandum circulated by Mr. Anthony Kesten, a senior official in the Department, and it came into the hands of one of my hon. Friends. It instructs officials on how to deal with applications for grants and says:

"As you may be aware, Ministers have decided that, as part of their continuing review of DTI support, they want a more critical view to be taken by officials of possible support for single company R and D."

It goes on to describe various schemes covered by the memorandum and then comes the interesting part:

"Ministers have said that, while companies should not be firmly discouraged from making applications, no attempt should be made to seek them out."

It goes on to list various ways in which compani to be encouraged:

"I should emphasise that Ministers do not se requirements as marking any change in policy essential that, in their day to day contacts with c case officers do not suggest otherwise."

The published guidelines remain and officials mu that they have been diverted from them, but ther fewer applications and it is the duty of officials sure that that happens. The document continues that when officials visit companies they should that there has been any change in policy. In ca any doubt about whether this is meant to applications are meant to fall as a result, a phr last part of the document says:

"Offers that have been made prior to toda affected by this instruction."

So this is an instruction from Ministers to offici Department to make a change of policy but not it to those who are affected by it, and to make fewer applications are granted. I can think of appropriate demonstration of the disreput deceitful techniques adopted by the Government revealed by this memorandum produced by the It would be useful if some Minister told us about stage.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John If the right hon. and learned Gentleman bel memorandum was such a secret, perhaps he coul why this was announced in the DTI White Pape

Mr. Smith: The scheme has now been c abolished in the DTI White Paper, so we shall no bother with it. As the right hon. Gentleman kn existence of the memorandum was revealed b White Paper was published. The shadow Chief did us a public service by giving the memorandu newspapers before the Government published th Paper, so the Chief Secretary's excuse will not d

Does the Chief Secretary think that it is Ministers to give instructions to officials to pret a policy has not changed when it has? The fact Chief Secretary, perhaps prudently, remains in shows that he would find defending what I have c impossible in a decent and sensible Government. I am afraid, typical of what goes on.

The Government approach public expenditur fundamentally erroneous standpoint, both in value and economic analysis. The truth is th directed and targeted public expenditure has a cru to play in providing good social services and ach successful economic policy. If we do not invest i and technology, research and development and we cannot provide a base for long-term sustained particularly for industries at the leading technology, which are especially at risk no Government must know, because almost ever British industry knows, that the technological British industry is dangerously fragile. In c Chancellor believes that that is merely an inventio Opposition—he seems to think that every crit the Government comes from some deluded imagin the Opposition Benches—let me quote to Financial Times leader for 13 January. Toda January, so I am pretty up to date and cannot be of lack of topicality:

"British industry is still beset by many problems; productivity is between a half and a third lower than that of its competitors; private sector spending on R and D and training is low; few companies can claim to be world leaders in their sectors; the regional spread of industry is exceptionally uneven, with head offices, jobs and purchasing power concentrated in the south-east".

I do not wish to criticise British industry merely for the sake of it, but many people would regard that as an accurate statement of some of the problems facing British industry. What it says about technology and, even more so, about unbalanced regional development is certainly true.

Of course, the Prime Minister and other members of the Government constantly pretend that there is no north-south division in the country, but everyone else knows that there is. We know that we have unbalanced economic development. There is a danger that, to prevent overheating in the south, the brakes will be clamped on the economy and the north will find itself in even more difficulty because it has never even got going.

The misallocation of resources—especially of social resources—that results from this unbalanced economic development is large. It is having a dastardly effect on the regions. On any analysis of the British economic situation we discover that, as the Financial Times leader said, the reality is startlingly different from the complacent picture sketched by the Chancellor. If we read his own Autumn Statement carefully we discover that it predicts that growth will fall, inflation increase and the balance of payments deficit deteriorate.

The Chancellor does us no service by minimising the dangers that face the economy. Many of them arise from the short-term policies of recent years—stimulating a consumer boom for electoral considerations, for instance—which have generated an unsustainable economic growth and aggravated our balance of trade and balance of payments problems.

It is also true, as I think the Chancellor is willing to recognise, that some of our dangers stem from the dangerous disequilibrium in the world economy. He referred at some length to the international position. We recollect that after the events of Black Monday he promised us a meeting of G7 within a short time. He said that as soon as there was an accord with the United States there would be a meeting of the G7 Ministers. That was repeated throughout December but there was no meeting; the so-called telephone accord was scrambled together on 23 December—just before Christmas. It did not appear to have much useful effect in the markets. It does not look as if there will be a meeting of the G7 Ministers in January, either. It looks as if there will be no meeting at all.

It is difficult to believe, given the serious problems facing the world economy, that it is not imperative that the leading industrial nations get together to hammer out common policies to tackle these common problems.

We have three acute inter-linking problems—the enormous imbalance in world trade, the management of currency values and the international debt problem. In recent days there has been an intervention by the central banks—the Chancellor referred to it—to thwart the speculators who prey on movements in currencies. However, I am bound to observe that, while I am glad that that appears to have had some success, it might have been wiser, before the end of the year, to make sure that the United States was prepared to defend its currency before our reserves were swollen by dollars at what Treas officials conceded to the Select Committee was a probal loss of 10 per cent. due to the dollar's subsequent fall.

What action have the Governments of the G7 countr taken to deal with the trade imbalances? They may operating through their central banks to exert so influence on the exchange rates. Incidentally, Chancellor has travelled a long way from the days wh he said that exchange rates, like interest rates, were matt for the market. That was all we heard from 1979 to 198 He talks about consistency of policy—what a change move from the markets deciding these matters to manag floating. What on earth is managed floating if not roundabout system of intervention? It is a way in whi a person who did not previously believe in interventi comes to say that he is now in favour of it. The Chancell cannot say that he wants managed currencies, because wants to retain an element of floating, so now we have hybrid called managed floating—the Chancello contribution to the international economic dialogue. It a little imprecise, as one would expect from the author the phrase. It is not clear how it will work or wheth anyone agrees with it, but it is the Chancello contribution. I suppose that we should welcome any sig of his repentance and of his having at least moved aw from the rather arid free-market, non-interventioni doctrines that he preached to the House, in the name consistency, from 1979 to the early 1980s.

We must concert the economic policies of the maj countries that are in difficulties. It is all very well for t Chancellor to wring his hands and say that it is academic dream to think that countries will be able concert their domestic economic policies—that was wh he said in his speech. It is also an academic dream to thin that free markets can solve all the relationships betwe countries. As far as I can see, that is a much mo academic, and certainly a much more dreamlike, way approaching the situation than attempting, by persuasio diplomacy and patient efforts, to encourage oth countries to bring their policies more in line with eac other or, at least, to run them in such a way that they d not conflict with the common interest of economi stability.

If the United States unwinds its trade deficit too quickl —the Chancellor referred only to the budget deficit; h did not deal with the trade deficit—the danger is tha there will be trouble, not only for the system, but mo especially for those who trade with the United States. I we are to avoid the recessionary perils and the downtur in world economic activity that might lie in store, we nee an expansion in the economies of Western Europe an Japan. It is true that there has been some expansion i Japan. However, it appears that, if anything, Wes Germany is moving in a more restrictive direction, if recen statements by the Finance Minister and the Chancellor o the Federal Republic are to be fulfilled.

Our Chancellor may say that others are not behavin as they should. He was happy to berate the United State in his Mansion House speech and did so a little today Criticism has been directed heavily against that quarter but West Germany is now appearing as a co-defendant i the Chancellor of the Exchequer's dock.

I cannot help but observe that the United States larg trade deficit was the basis of a great deal of the British exports, without which our trade balance would look ever worse than it does today. Therefore, it would be mor fitting if the Chancellor gave at least a nod in that direction when he feels that he must criticise the United States so vigorously.

Are we not told by the Government, who find it difficult to persuade other countries to concert their policies, that Britain has a new importance in the world and that unlike previous years, when, it is said, we were not regarded as an important country, we now walk the world's stage with a new-found self-confidence which is based on the Government's vigorous economic policies? If that is so, why does nobody else in the world appear to listen to the Chancellor?

The Chancellor could usefully spend some time with his colleagues, the Finance Ministers of the other G7 countries, in preparing a joint approach to tackle those problems. They should work hard at what is perhaps the difficult work of concerting their policies and they should start as soon as possible. They should not, of course, put the international debt problem to one side. Although there has been some movement regarding Mexico, little international attention has been paid to the problem.

I am prepared to be generous to the Chancellor and accept that his proposals for the sub-Saharan situation should be welcomed. Indeed, they are certainly supported by Opposition Members. However, he has not persuaded anyone else about them and has certainly not yet persuaded the United States. The international debt problem must be tackled with much more vigour by the leading industrial countries and must be given a much higher place of importance on the international agenda.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): The right hon. and learned Gentleman has tried to have some cheap fun at the Government's expense over the description of managed floating. Will he be specific on one point and add to his welcome for managed floating a welcome for the present exchange rates that that policy has achieved? If not, will he tell us precisely at what exchange rate his party thinks that the Government should now aim?

Mr. Smith: I do not think that it was cheap to comment on the Chancellor of the Exchequer's and the Government's development of thinking since 1979. That seems essential background for understanding some of the things that he said today. I would take the hon. Gentleman's criticism a little more seriously if he could point out any inaccuracies in what I have said. However, I have described accurately the way in which we have moved from non-intervention to intervention in an elliptical manner.

The exchange rate at any particular time is a matter of judgment. One must especially take into account the effect on industry in this country. I fear that the Chancellor is excessively nervous about interest rates because he is not confident about inflation in this country. That is why he turned down the CBI's request to reduce interest rates. I am flattered that the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) should be so anxious to find out the detail of the policy from the Opposition. That is a welcome development. Conservative Members are finding it hard to obtain answers from Ministers, so I encourage them to ask for answers from the Opposition.

I should like to turn — [Interruption.] Well, the experts on turning are on the Conservative, not the Opposition, Benches. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) is as yet unconverted. He is st monetarist, which is why he is not on the Tr He would have to change his position to Treasury Bench.

To achieve some change in internatio Government would need to see our position The trouble is that they are suffocated by a satisfied complacency and self-congratul prevents the development of an alternative present chaotic state of affairs.

That sense of complacency obscures an a the real problems and dangers that lie ahead economy. The Chancellor knows perfec inflation is likely to increase. Indeed, Statement predicts that it will increase, whic so nervous about interest rates. He productivity growth is likely to slacken a unlikely to be sustained by the sort of supply of support for science and technology, development, investment in manufacturing so on, for which the Labour party argues b not be followed by the Conservative party.

The Chancellor knows that an economic founded on a massive extension of consumer on shaky foundations. He knows that all pred world growth head downwards. Indeed, they downwards even before Black Monday and be revised downwards even further as diminish. In that situation—[Interruption.] the facts that are set out for us by the Org Economic Co-operation and Development, the World Bank and, indeed, by all who con international economic situation. I advise Members that it is extremely instructive to publications to discover what it says abou economy and to compare that with what Government say and, even more, with wha press says about the British economy. One think that one was looking at the s circumstances.

A wise Chancellor would face the problem adapt his policies to meet it. Let me give th some advice—[Interruption.] I am not arg Government being consistent; I am trying to policies. My whole purpose in life is to Government's policies. I welcome the chan but wish that they were more sincere and bett Indeed, I am hoping for greater things. I sh almost entirely on hope in that respect during or two.

We know that there are difficulties and it avoid considering them. I should like Chancellor one or two pieces of advice, espe inflation. He should now announce the aban the foolish privatisation of the electricity and industries. I have an unconfident hope that he learnt something from the privatisatio Government's share of British Petroleum. It d a triumph to have managed the trans predominant share in Britain's greatest cor British national ownership to Kuwaiti nationa Had that been advertised as the likely outc operation, there might have been fewer bra display and fewer commandos scaling City offi the day of the issue. Indeed, it might have been more appropriate to have had a courtesy detachment of the Kuwaiti national guard at BP's front door.

However, despite the warnings of that experience, the Government appear to wish to press on with privatisation. If the Chancellor is serious about controlling inflation, I say to him, "Please avoid imposing that extra 15 per cent. on the cost of electricity in two years to fatten up the books for privatisation; relieve British industry and British consumers of an extra £500 million which does not need to be put on their backs." All he needs to do that is to swallow his pride and to change his policy.

As the Chancellor considers his Budget in the next week or two, I hope he will heed the advice that has apparently been given to him by his own advisers, which is that to proceed with tax cuts would be highly irresponsible in Britain's present circumstances.

I will quote from the Daily Telegraph—it is hardly irresponsible if it is in that newspaper. I believe that the Chancellor once contributed to the City page of that newspaper or one of its sister journals. On 24 December 1987 it was reported:

> "A row has broken out between the Chancellor, Mr. Lawson, and his senior Treasury advisers over the wisdom of cutting taxes in the next Budget against the rapid deterioration in Britain's overseas payments position . . . Sir Terry Burns, chief economic adviser at the Treasury, is understood to be leading the revolt against a tax-cutting Budget."

We all wish him luck.

Apart from being a wrong decision on priorities in relation to public expenditure, tax cuts would feed straight through into increased consumer expenditure, particularly in the more prosperous areas, and increase overheating of parts of the economy, exaggerating regional imbalances and, above all, adding a further twist to the increasing balance of payments deficit. If the resources were used instead in prudent and well-directed increases in public expenditure, we could achieve an improvement in services, real help for our struggling regions and better foundations for long-lasting industrial success and avoid an aggravation of our most serious economic problem, which is the balance of payments.

The Chancellor constantly ignores the balance of trade and the balance of payments difficulties, but they will be the most serious constraints on the management of the British economy in the difficult years that lie ahead. I believe that it would profit the Chancellor and the Government much more to take these challenges, problems and difficulties more seriously. I ask the Chancellor to tell the House and the nation how the Government propose that we should overcome them. But to do that would mean abandoning their outlook and some of their prejudices. They would have to change some of their objectives. I hope that that will come about, although I am not confident about it. The Autumn Statement gives us no evidence that it will.

We know from our campaign on the Health Service that, however reluctantly, we have moved the Government. I can assure them that on this cause and some others we will fight and fight again to save the services that we love.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. May I repeat Mr. Speaker's plea for brief speeches.

5.36 pm

Mr. John Biffen (Shropshire, North): The debate Autumn Statement is traditionally a wide-r economic debate, as we were reminded by my righ Friend the Chancellor when he used it as an occas consider the world economy. We know that my righ Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury will be w up on the contentious issues of public spending, should like to direct these remarks mainly to him.

Before I do so, may I say this about the economy generally. We are holding the debate against a backg of a quite remarkably successful record of eco management, which has persisted through characteristic acts of Government. The Chancell been twitted for having adjusted his policies in times. All I can say is that wise and prudent cont economic affairs requires that degree of flexibility. all, it means a commitment to an underlying theme, we have inherited and executed since 1979 to bring greater monetary stability and expansion of owne and broadly speaking to create for this country a market economy that could perform for us what has performed for our continental neighbours in circumstances. Much of what we have achieved testimony to that degree of resolution.

I should like to make two points to the House. I that I shall not detain hon. Members beyond the indicated by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The first of relates to the search for more effective qualitativ quantitative control of public spending, and the s relates to the social and political priorities revealed spending plans of the Autumn Statement. A searc more refined control of public spending has al elements of the quest for the holy grail. It has preocc and detained politicians for generation after genera Little short of 30 years ago we had what was, I sup a seminal contribution from the Plowden report on p expenditure. I suspect that that has been largely forg in subsequent comments, reports and inquests, and i in the setting up of institutions; a more recent one, pe the most colourful of them, is the "Star Chamber". appropriate here that I should pay tribute to Whitelaw, for no man could have presided over suc institution with such genial effectiveness.

But at the end of the day, there is no doubt wha that the execution of public spending, the determini its totality, and the identification of priorities are ma that require political will, skill and authority; for it is and the interplay of those factors, which is finally effe

Although I was much rewarded by reading the r of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, it said:

> "Our predecessors in 1984 said that they had increasingly concerned 'that the mechanism for determ public expenditure priorities, which produces the results Autumn Statement, is not working as well as it should' I have to tell it that that has all the virginal innocen the Social Democratic and Liberal policy document shall always live without that delicate reality of ha found a truly objective way in which public expenditu interpreted. No, it is a political process.

One of the values of our debate this afternoon is it is a process in which the House of Commons can We have the Autumn Statement figures; but we are here just to underwrite them and say that they are a s judgments that have been carried out by the Exec which command our deferential respect. Politics is not like that. It is a continuing process. Only a few weeks ago, £100 million came forward for the Health Service. That expenditure was determined in the context of a proper and continuing debate, in which this Chamber plays a part.

With that reflection, I would like to make a few further remarks about our health spending. Already, this debate is being given a more reflective nature, and that is to be welcomed. My hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who has been referred to already this afternoon, has produced a pamphlet pointing out some of the changes that would be appropriate in our approach to providing health services for the nation. It is not simply a question of adding money to the existing structures. That is the short term and immediate challenge, but there is a wider discipline which, unless we recognise and acknowledge it, invalidates calls merely for more money in present circumstances.

I should like to say to my right hon. and hon. Friends, and indeed to the House generally, that it is 40 years since Aneurin Bevan obtained his political immortality with his National Health Service legislation. Any discussion on this topic will always be inspired by the principles that preoccupied his life. But, 40 years on, this is an occasion not just for a memorial service, but for real consideration of factors that begin to affect the whole funding of National Health Service provision in this country.

I should like to put before the House five immediate considerations that I should like to detain some body—perhaps not as ambitious as a Royal Commission, but some study group within Government that would be the precursor for producing a discussion document upon which policy changes could proceed.

First, we have to ask ourselves whether the great increase in personal disposable income has affected the original argument about the extent to which one could look to an element of state managed insurance, as opposed to direct Treasury funding. Secondly, we have to assess and anticipate the demands made upon the service by the changing age structure of our society. Thirdly, the resource implications of changing medical technology have to be further assessed. That factor is of accelerating importance. Then we have to consider the relevance of the present random application of charges. The power to make charges was a very early strain upon the political circumstances of the service. Indeed, it helped in the resignation of Aneurin Bevan. What we have learnt since then is that they have become very much an integral part, albeit modest, of the application of the National Health Service.

Mr. Eric Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Biffen: No, I am trying to proceed within the times imposed. I am sorry, because I enjoy debate.

Then there is the undoubted growth of private medical insurance. It is something that we can trace and it is inspired very substantially by group membership of employees, whether trade union members or not; it is very much an employee-dominated expansion.

So let us consider those five principles and make a calm and reflective judgment about what is possibly a more appropriate system of funding for the future than the one we now have. Thereafter, we are likely to be able to say what institutional changes, if any, are ne

It is not the task of hon. Members to engage in detailed judgments, and I do not intend to do so at all, but I say to my right hon. Friend that whatever sum is chosen is bound to be related to the total resources that he has available for tax changes and tax reductions. I hope that at least the equivalent of between 1p and 2p of tax change on the direct rate will be available for the Health Service; that is the kind of change necessary to re-secure an initiative in this situation.

There is no question whatever that a reformed and vital Health Service and social services are not an overhead, not an incubus upon the productive economy, but a natural partnership for an economy based upon the social market principles which have sustained this party and this economy so well.

5.46 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): The House will have heard with great interest the doctrine put forward by the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) on the position of the Health Service. Although we would certainly disagree on a number of details, there can be no question of the importance attached to it in this debate by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) as well as by the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North. They have illustrated its importance both for the future of the Government and for the way in which the Government regard their public expenditure.

We must hope for changes from the Chancellor of the Exchequer because one thing is clear — he is a great learner. He has learnt a great deal in the past eight years during which he has been involved in the management of this country's economy, as Financial Secretary to the Treasury, later in the Department of Energy and more recently as Chancellor, and the House should recognise it and pay some sort of tribute to him for it as well. We must remember that when he started his work on behalf of the Government in financial and economic matters he believed that the markets were able to decide these matters with a degree of perfection which he has now come to understand is not available to it.

As we all know—although there is no point in going into these matters in great detail at this remove in time —he believed in the sanctity of M3 and the monetarist position, and he believed too that these great lessons that had been taught by what he considered to be the mismanagement of the 1970s would be put right in the 1980s. Now he understands that markets, although they may finally decide a number of issues, are, as he put it himself, frequently in a position to overshoot, and that those who look for fundamental causes in the making of their decisions in markets are not likely to do very well in their market operations. The proper success of market operations lies all too frequently in determining the behaviour of other market operators rather than determining the fundamental causes themselves. That is the weakness of markets, and the Chancellor now understands the weakness of markets and the way in which they can fluctuate around any particular norm.

He took those kinds of lessons to the Plaza agreement and used them in the context of the Louvre accord, and they were valuable in helping him understand the way in which Finance Ministers can co-operate to a limite in bringing about a level of the pound, of the dolla deutschmark, of the yen that is in line with lo prospects.

The realisation of the importance of these mat the learning process, however, are not at an end. thing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer needs is the importance of manufacturing industry. As exports — the oil industry is one of the facto distort our trading economy — become less a important and we are able to obtain fewer resourc oil, the role of manufacturing industry will beco more important. I welcome the greater attention Chancellor is giving to the manufacturing in Nowadays he frequently mentions improvem manufacturing industry. The past year's impro have been improvements on a very poor level inc is evidenced by our experience in our constituenc they are improvements nevertheless. We can onl that we shall make up some of the ground lost d past eight years.

Perhaps I should draw attention to the report Treasury and Civil Service Committee and pay tri the Committee—as I usually try to and as we all — for producing its report quickly and in circumstances. Although the Committee's conclusi not unanimous, the analysis is especially useful to list of specialist advisers is also impressive. experience—indeed, in the experience of all tho have served on the Select Committee — advis prepared to undertake work at inconvenient times inadequate reward. The Select Committee can stil the finest advice available and that is cau congratulation. We have people outside the Gove machine who are prepared to give advice compar the advice that the Chancellor received in although not in detail. I note sadly the absence agreed report. I know that the report clearly sets different views, but these can often be obtained variety of academic, economic and journalistic sou is most valuable when a Select Committee puts a partial affections and tries to put suggestions to the to overcome some of the differences that exist a matters in a different context. A Select Committe only body that can do that and, if it does not, it is in an important objective.

We must all believe that for the next 1 months that situation will be uncertain at best. evidence to the Select Committee, replying to questi 124 on 9 December, the Chancellor said:

"In the first place I see no sign at the present time world going into recession. All the recent figures that w had so far do admittedly relate to the period before th market collapsed."

I detected a little more pessimism in his commen afternoon. The Chancellor said that he saw no sign world going into recession. We hope that he is although it all depends on what one means by rec There will certainly be a slowing down of world and a reduction in United States activity. In the shor it is likely that oil will produce less revenue and, important, that its beneficial effects on our balance of payments compared with those of oil-importing countries will be weaker.

It is clearly accepted that in the short-term, and at the time of the Budget, the Chancellor will have money to spend. He will have perhaps £3 billion and perhaps as much as £4 billion or even £5 billion. He wants to use that money to lower the standard rate of income tax to 25 per cent. and the higher rate to 50 per cent. He would dearly like to end capital gains tax, which, following its emasculation, raises only about £1·3 billion—not good value for the amount of work involved. I would dearly like it to be increased but I realise that it is unlikely that we shall increase revenue from capital gains under this Government. The Chancellor would like to reduce part of the cost of mortgage tax relief, which stands as a fiscal rebuke to his failure to achieve the greater tax neutrality that he has at heart. The abolition of capital gains tax and the reduction in the cost of mortgage relief are not likely to feature in the Budget resolutions. What comfort the Chancellor has stems from the hope that the incidence of mortgage tax relief may be reduced due to reductions in income tax.

I query the Chancellor's proposed use of the resources available. At present, we have a well-planned consumer boom. No one can doubt the tactical experience and expertise that the Chancellor has brought to bear in these matters. He planned the boom for the election and it has not quite got out of hand yet, which, in itself, is an achievement that has not often been equalled. Nevertheless, an increase in consumer expenditure is planned in 1988. It is expected that GDP will increase by 2·5 per cent. and consumer expenditure by 4 per cent. The expected increase in manufactured imports, which is already being realised, is a consequence of that.

The major budgetary question this year is how to spend the money from a reduced public sector borrowing requirement. Faced with the possibility of a world recession—at best a downturn in world activity and a consumer boom at home—it would be folly to couple that with tax handouts that would increase consumption further and thus increase manufactured imports and worsen our balance of payments. It would be far better to use that money now in the interests of the long-term future of manufacturing industry and to improve the serious economy, which we shall need to support us in any difficult times ahead—and there may be difficult times ahead. This is not the time to be spending money in consumer booms following the election consumer boom. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East said, investment in education, training and health can all be useful. What we should not do is to spend the money in a way that will only lead to a further import boom in an attempt to meet the Chancellor's requirements of tax rates of 25 per cent. and 50 per cent.

I should also draw attention to the White Paper "DTI — the department for Enterprise". I understand Ministers' desire to direct expenditure on industry into the most worthwhile projects. Ministers have always felt that they need greater control of the money that they have available—in regulations and statutory instruments to set out the ways in which the money available can be spent. They frequently find that the money does not go for the purposes for which they wish it to go. They try to target it and ask, "How can we ensure that t this purpose?". That is an understa worthwhile desire. However, it is easy can move from that to giving civil serv to decide who should have how mu purpose. Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): My rig Chancellor of the Exchequer rightly strength of the economy. I commend him improvements in the economic strengt over the past few years.

It is not suggested or proposed Statement that the same rate of adva enjoyed over the past year or two will be seen again. As the House knows, the forecast is for a slower rate of growth and an increasing deterioration in our balance of trade. I accept that it is still a small proportion of our GDP, but nevertheless the relative deficit in our balance of trade is certain to increase.

One matter that concerns me is confidence. Last October we observed a sharp fall in the stock market. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor was right to address himself to that problem and be as bullish as he could about our future prospects. In this mood of international co-operation, it is doubly important that careful use be made of language when criticising our allies. I raised this matter in a speech just before Christmas. I could not then, and cannot now, see any point in criticising President Reagan so volubly as happened in my right hon. Friend's Mansion House speech. What was the point of it? If it were because the President and Congress were not aware of the difficulties arising from America's internal deficit, I would be amazed. It is not as though my right hon. Friend was ignorant of the fact that America's constitution made it difficult for the President and Congress unanimously to agree on what should be done. I regret that criticism, because it affected confidence then, and that effect still persists.

It is important to understand the options that exist for the United States, because that is where the problem lies. The problem concerns the United States' internal and external deficit. My right hon. Friend and others have frequently told the Americans that they must put their house in order and to do so by various uncomfortable measures. We should recognise that one of the ways in which America can improve its position is by allowing, for however temporary a period, a continuing fall in the value of the dollar in relation to other currencies.

With regard to the effect of the fall in the value of the dollar in relation to other currencies, only 9 per cent. of America's GDP is involved in imports. It is much less of a sacrifice for the United States to allow a fall in the value of the dollar relative to other currencies. Furthermore, it is bound to be beneficial to its manufacturing industry to have less competition from Japanese companies and other industrial imports. A substantial proportion of its imports are dollar imports.

I remember a book by Mr. Servan-Schreiber in which he complained about the level of United States' investment in France. Now that there is a large American deficit, substantial sums of money are being invested in the United States. The criticism then was that the American dollar was all-powerful: but now the dollar is criticised for being far too weak. There must be some consistency in these matters and we must understand that an attack on the Americans and the way in which they pursue their affairs will damage confidence. With regard to markets, the question of confidence is very important.

I wish I could share my right hon. Friend's confidence about working with other countries to prop up the dollar and keep the deutschmark and yen in their proper place. The movements are so great and the pressures so large that only if the natural course of events is allowed to take place and money allowed to flow freely where investors wish it to go will the position right itself. The dollar trade deficit must eventually be met by willing investors. It is unlikely to do so if investors think that the dollar is being propped up at the wrong price by a combination of central banks. They will wait until the crisis is over and the dollar finds its own level. There is a new special dra agreement between the United States and Ja interest rates low, which I am sure is benefic ordinary investment view, dollar assets, manufacturing assets, are cheap compared wi

It may be that the dollar still has further to time will come when investment in the dollar w be most productive. What are we proposing that the Americans in an election year? This is the course of action proposing they should take. First, they should expenditure; secondly, they should raise tax they should raise interest rates; or any com those. As my right hon. That represents only 10 per cent. of ou but when one thinks of the amount of Americ to the European Community, which represent 20 per cent., and of the fact that 50 per cent. of go to the European Community, one sees substantial improvement in the United State exports is bound to be felt by the European C for us, because, as the House knows, we are forecasting a higher trade deficit during this year. We are also forecasting the most rapid rate of growth in the Community, so we may find a progressive deterioration in the balance of trade, as has been suggested in the Autumn Statement. To the extent that the United States position improves, more strain is bound to be felt within the European Community.

On the stock market collapse, it appears that, during the past five or six years, when the economy has been performing well, it has been helped along by the avid appetite of the United States for imports. We and other countries have benefited greatly from that avidity, but it will no longer be there, which will cause a strain on world trade. We know the difficulties with Japan and negotiations in West Germany. I remind the House of what happened in the stock market collapse in 1929. In 1930, there was a creditable recovery in share prices, but then there was a pressure for trade restraint on every side, which started with the Smout-Hawley Act and went to tariff restraint by Italy and France, and by 1932 we had our own tariff wall through the Ottawa agreement.

The same pressures will start again, not directly with tariff restraint but with voluntary export restraint, which now covers about 50 per cent. of all world trade. I suggest that this is the time to negotiate with other countries to ensure that we open up our markets to the United States and allow the progressive liberalism of world trade. If we were to find the pace of world economic growth slowing down, which is quite likely to be the case, it is up to those who expect to find an improvement in the United States trading position to open their markets correspondingly, and the greatest responsibility for that rests on the European Community. It appears to me that this could be done most effectively by revising the common agricultural policy as early as possible.

I recognise what the Government are doing, but to lecture the Americans when we have the nerve to pile up surpluses amounting to £13 a week for every family in the country, and forbidding the free movement of other agricultural produce into the European Community, is nonsense. We must be very careful during the next few months to see that what happened in the early 1930s on restraint of trade does not happen again. It will require a good deal of leadership and steady nerves. If we are to be certain that the stock market collapse does not lead to a recession, we must open up our markets. The European Community must play its part, and so must we, not by buying dollars at the wrong price but by opening our markets in Europe; in other words, to bring in the old world to redress the balance of the new.

The crisis is not over yet. I would like to think that it is, but I do not believe it is. We need the skill and patience which the founders of the European Community showed in gaining the unity of Europe. We need to show skill, patience and perseverance in dismantling the barriers for the movement of goods and services throughout the world. The task needs leadership, which we and our partners in Europe are uniquely qualified to give, and I hope we give it.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The House enjoyed the commentary of the hon. Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern). I agree with his conclusion. I am sorry that the Chancellor is leaving, because I wanted to give him some information. I have been conducting some market research on an issue that I know concerns him. If he is thinking of extending VAT in the Budget, he will get as critical a response as did my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) from my hon. Friends and me. I suggest that he should not contemplate it for a moment.

Having left the Chancellor with the fruits of my labours of the past couple of days, I wish to say that the hon. Member for Horsham took a curious view in criticising the Chancellor for what he said about the American economy. It may be as well to rein in the Chancellor a little for his desire to lecture the rest of the world. Perhaps he took his example from the Prime Minister and presumed upon the Prime Minister's influence with the American President, but there is another side to the scenario which the hon. Gentleman painted.

If the lack of confidence in the United States continues, the dollar continues to slide and Wall Street—I mean those who use Wall Street as a means to invest their money—continues to doubt the willingness of the American Administration to cope with its economic difficulties, the end product is recession of a kind which will end up in this country.

The hon. Gentleman is right to point out that we shall pay a price for the correction in the American economy, but we cannot stand back and say, "We do not mind what you do; we do not care what happens in the American economy". Still less can we fail to show some sympathy for those in the United States who are trying to get more sensible economic management. One of the President's mottos is, "Defence is not a budget issue; you spend what you need". Attractive as that may be as a concept, it plays havoc with control of public expenditure and demonstrates that everything cannot be blamed on Congress because some of that spending was generated by the President.

The economy has undergone a significant recovery and there have been some worthwhile achievements. The House should recognise the good things in the Chancellor's more recent economic management, as well as the good luck he has had. We must recognise that millions of people have a different perception of this. Many of them remember the industrial destruction which preceded the current growth and from which the current growth is measured. Many of them were the victims of it—those who lost their jobs in that industrial destruction and those whose hopes were destroyed. Then there are those who are the victims of unemployment or low wages, who do not see any of the rich benefits and pickings that are to be found in many parts of the country, and those who are in regions where the feeling of economic prosperity is not present or is confined to a few prosperous pockets.

It is very easy to view the present economic conditions with equanimity and, indeed, some enthusiasm from Westminster, but it looks very different in other parts of the country. That is why the Government's public expenditure proposals are of considerable interest, even if that interest has been overshadowed by this week's proposals on regional aid in the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry's White Paper. This is not really the occasion to debate that; we shall have an opportunity to do so in a week or so. However, it has caused great concern and anxiety that, in reality, regional expenditure will go down, because many requests for selective aid will be refused. The loss of automaticity will be seen as a marvellous opportunity for a reduction in public expenditure on regional aid, and it is impossible to conceive of the system resisting such an opportunity when it is presented.

The right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) spoke very forcefully, and with widespread support, about the Health Service as one of the key expenditure issues that we must face. He was right to insist that there is a political judgment to be made — a political recognition that the people of this country have such a high regard for their Health Service and that they are prepared to make sacrifices to see it maintained at a reasonable level. The present degree of decline in the Health Service evokes real anger right across political opinion. Anxiety is not confined to those who support Opposition parties; it is strongly in evidence among those who voted for the Government.

Several factors advanced by the right hon. Gentleman as relevant to the current debate are indeed important. We must have a debate on the financing of the Health Service. It is not enough to imply that the problems would go away if we increased funding significantly. The right hon. Gentleman put forward a bold claim for, in effect, expenditure of £3 billion on the Health Service. However, even if that were carried out, we cannot pretend that there would be no people waiting for operations and no waiting lists in particular specialties or parts of the country.

We can get rid of some of the waiting lists. However, it is inherent in the nature of the Health Service that difficult choices are posed, and the more that medicine advances, the more difficult those choices become. In the past, politicians have failed to face up to them; they have preferred to let them be coped with within the medical system—and, in particular, to leave them to doctors—on the understandable ground that there are merits in clinical freedom. The fact remains, however, that, given the present capacity of medical technology, decisions made purely by doctors cannot answer the public's demands for access to high-technology medicine, and that system cannot cope with the sort of judgment that may need to be made about the relative priorities given to preventive and high-technology medicine. The difficult choices must be made by politicians, and there must be debate about them.

However, the capacity of the Health Service to cope with that debate and, indeed, with the issue of better management simply is not there if it is suffering severe restraint. Such restraint is now taking place. Although the Government can point to real increases in Health Service expenditure, the number of people in an aging population needing the Health Service is larger, and the development of medical technology is another factor. In the present climate, better management of the Health Service cannot be achieved: indeed, the present climate has given efficient management a bad name. Any health authority that tries to organise its resources effectively is up against a climate in which so many other things are happening, for purely financial reasons, that it has difficulty in justifying any decision that it may make.

No worthwhile debate or development can take place unless the Health Service is better funded, and that applies particularly to NHS pay problems. Health authorities have had to cope with insufficient funding for nationally agreed pay increases, and the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee has pointed to the difficulty that arises when those pay increases are only ever dealt with from within the Department's own budget, and never compared as a potential expenditure with spending in other Departments.

We must have some way of discussing from time to time whether an increase in the funding of, for instance, the roads programme is more important than an increase in nurses' pay. The social and political judgments that have led to attempts to deal with chronic low pay in the Health Service must surely have implications beyond the existing budgets of that service. The Select Committee was right to point that out in its report, and I commend it for doing so — I was not present at the meeting at which that passage was put in.

The Government must respond to what is being said about the Health Service. That is the key message that the Chancellor must receive from the public expenditure part of the debate. However, this is also an opportunity to review what has happened since the Chancellor made his Autumn Statement. I have some sympathy with him, because forecasting what would happen to the economy just after Black Monday was a bit like forecasting what would happen to our parties' merger prospects at about breakfast time yesterday: it was not exactly a promising time at which to make prophecies.

Some of us said at the time of the statement that the Chancellor would have to revise or reconsider his assessments, especially because he was so optimistic about the international response that he was expecting. He was pretty bullish about what would be done by the Americans, the Germans and the Japanese. The hon. Member for Horsham spoke about the dangers of the previous avid American purchasers of goods manufactured in Britain ceasing to be part of the picture if measures are taken in the American economy. The counterpart of that is that we want avid Japanese buyers for British goods. We want to see an expansion in Japanese domestic demand, and we welcome the efforts that the Foreign Secretary has been making to challenge the Japanese Government on such matters as trade barriers.

The Chancellor has not said much today to revise the extraordinarily optimistic assumptions that he made then. Is he not concerned by the dangers of an overstrengthening of the pound against the deutschmark? He has not said much about that today either. Is there not also a real danger of spiralling world recession, with collapsing commodity prices feeding through to serious problems for Third world countries, which are already beset by the debt problems to which the Chancellor has made some effort to propose solutions? There has been support for his initiatives from both sides of the House, especially for those relating to Africa, but the problems are getting worse, and the measures that he was advocating a couple of months ago will not be adequate to deal with them.

In the light of the events of the past few months, the questions about the overall management of the economy that the Chancellor must consider relate to his aspirations for tax cuts, and the opportunities opened up to him by a public sector borrowing rate that is at historically and internationally low levels. While the economy is relatively healthy, it might be a wiser option to combine some investment in key services—the Health Service is one of them, but there are others, such as housing and home improvement — with taking steps against recession at home. At the same time, the Chancellor should seek the international co-operation without which we cannot reduce the risks of recession being imported from abroad. Clearly, it is more important than ever for Governments to be prepared to act internationally, but there is also a national dimension.

The Chancellor would do well to heed the warnings of the Centre for Economic Policy Research, which said in a report this month:

"continued failure to correct the underlying problems courts the risk of a slide into recession throughout most of the world."

The record of the last couple of months on international co-operation is pretty inadequate. Europe's future is threatened by prospects of slow growth and high unemployment, and the Chancellor's apparent satisfaction with the amount achieved so far is simply not borne out of any objective reading of what has been happening. If the demand from the United States economy declines, Europe must replace that lost demand, either from within itself or from the few other potential sources of purchasing power, such as Japan. That cannot be done without considerable international effort and co-operation.

Many people in this country have worked very hard to win such improvements as have been made in the economy. Those improvements are not won primarily by people sitting in Westminster or in No. 11 Downing Street; they are won by industrialists and by workers on the shop floor. Much of the price has been paid by people who are not at work, because they have no jobs, and have been the victims of the restructuring of industry.

Many people have much at stake in this country and abroad in those Third world countries where international help is needed. Considerable effort must be made to ensure that the events that took place on Wall Street and during the stock market collapse are not simply the beginning of a long saga, which would mean that the very confidence referred to by the Chancellor would not be induced and that, in the coming years, the suffering to which I have referred would be magnified.

6.29 pm

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): I greatly appreciate the kind remarks that have been made about the report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. The delay in setting up that Committee was immensely frustrating because it happened at a time when we were passing through perhaps the most turbulent set of events in international monetary affairs that we have witnessed for many years. None the less, I hope that the report that was produced, under considerable pressure, has been useful to the House.

You have asked, Mr. Speaker, that we should be brief and, therefore, I wish to restrict my remarks to two issues. First, I shall deal with the mechanism for determining public expenditure priorities and, secondly, I shall say something about exchange rate policy, which was the main item in the Chancellor's speech.

We are in the middle of a period of discussion on public expenditure. We have had the Autumn Statement and now we are having the debate. I gather that we shall soon have the public expenditure White Paper, which will spell out the detail. The Select Committee will, of course, then wish to take evidence on that White Paper and make its report. We shall have further debate on the White Paper aft that. In that time I hope that I can persuade my right ho Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury that we nee to look carefully at the mechanism for determining publ expenditure priorities. My right hon. Friend the Memb for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) was absolutely right t say that the determination of those priorities must b based on a series of political decisions. That is inevitabl but it does not mean that we should not try to make th mechanism for reaching those decisions as efficient a possible.

The present situation consists of bilateral discussion between the Treasury and the spending Departments and if necessary, recourse to the Star Chamber. That i followed by a quick Cabinet endorsement of the outcom with a great sigh of relief. That is not an effective way o determining priorities because there is no proper overa review of them.

The Select Committee has drawn attention to th problem that occurs when a Department makes a claim fo more resources that is large either in relation to its tota expenditure—which may be small in some cases—or i absolute terms. Over the years, we have had problems o that nature. Some years ago there was a problem concerning Sir Keith Joseph and the student grants. Ther was great controversy over a trivial sum of money whe the Treasury insisted that savings should come from withi the same Department. I believe that that attitude is th root cause of many of our problems. We had a simila difficulty at the Foreign Office when it had to find saving that had difficult implications for the BBC's oversea services. The Health Service is a classic example of th problem.

The Committee has pointed out that there was a larg demand to meet the increases in nurses' pay. The decisio was taken that savings would be found within the DHSS It is true that a large chunk of the increase for the nurses pay came from the reserve, but none the less savings have to be made within the health Department. That is the cause of many of our problems. From a constituency level we are aware that the increase in nurses' pay was not fully funded and that there was no scope for finding savings elsewhere, with the result that wards were closed. Such action represents an inefficient way of operating because the overheads run on just the same. I believe that the right approach would have been to seek the necessary savings across the board from other Departments and not simply from the DHSS.

I wish to comment on the statistics that have been bandied about on this issue. I do not believe that it is right to say that there has been an increase, in real terms, when allowing for inflation. We all know that the relative price effects of nurses' pay, pharmaceuticals and so on are significantly larger than the rate of inflation.

Mention is also made of expenditure on the Health Service in relation to GNP. I believe that the Select Committee took a balanced view on that issue. We drew attention to the substantial, unprecedented increase in NHS resources that has taken place. We pointed out that, as a percentage of GNP, resources had increased from 5·37 per cent. in 1979 to 6·12 per cent. in 1986. That is true of the past, but let us consider the plans for the future.

The right comparison is NHS expenditure adjusted by the Government's forecasts of inflation and the GNP forecast, which includes the inflation effect. If we make that comparison, we discover—I refer the House to the table that the Committee published—that the proposed increases in Health Service expenditure are significantly smaller, reducing to 1·2 per cent. of GNP. In other words, Health Service expenditure is not going up in line with GNP. I do not believe that the House would accept such an assessment of priorities.

Therefore, it is tremendously important that if there is a large increase in the resources demanded by a Department, consideration should be given to a broader approach to where those savings can be found. I accept, however, that such savings should first be sought within the Department. I accept that my proposed approach would not be easy, because the whole process would be opened up. The Chief Secretary would have to trot round from Department to Department saying, "I am sorry, but there has been a big increase in nurses' pay and you will have to cough up something." I accept that that would not be easy, but the present arrangement has run us into difficulties and will continue to do so. I do not believe that I am being naive and I believe there is a lesson to be learnt.

The Chancellor spent much of his time on intervention. Clearly—as my right hon. Friend said in evidence to the Select Committee—there has been a change of policy. Previously, the policy was to intervene only to smooth fluctuations in currency movements. That is different from saying that we will seek to maintain a level of rates in the face of what the markets would otherwise produce. In this regard the Louvre agreement was not sufficiently explicit. The present Committee and its predecessor noted that fact, and it is clear that the agreement has not operated in the way in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had hoped.

On page XII of the Committee's report we point out that the amount of intervention, in broad terms—the periods are not precisely the same—by the United States monetary authorities totalled $5 billion whereas the intervention by the other major participants totalled $95 billion. Therefore, the United States contribution to support its currency has been small in comparison to what everyone else has put in. We point out in our report that the resources available to the United States to sustain intervention operations are inadequate. The Chancellor has also pointed out that there was a weakening of resolve by the United States.

We are intervening in the currency markets to support the United States dollar, yet the United States Government are vacillating. That country is not a major participant in the operation and its resources to fund such an operation are inadequate. Intervention is an extremely dangerous operation on which to embark and it has serious cost implications for Britain.

The Select Committee and the Chancellor agree that there is a case for seeking underlying stability. I do not believe that such stability can be achieved as a result of intervention, because that means adopting a speculative position against considerable market forces.

Finally, I wish to pick up a point made by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). He does not understand the market philosophy. It is quite different to intervene in the way that I described, when the market has sought to establish a position and one is trying to change it. The market is determined by supply and demand, and intervention may affect the demand. If one wants to establish stability on a more permanent basis, one must seek to influence the underlying forces and powers that influence the market. In that respect my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is right. It has to be done by differential interest rates or by fiscal policy, or by a combination of the two.

Therefore, while I understand the need for co-operation, and pay tribute to the way in which my right hon. Friend has worked hard in that area, I do not think that it is the right approach to say that there is no hope of getting agreement on interest rates and fiscal policy unless there is agreement on intervention. For reasons that I have already mentioned, I consider that intervention is a temporary palliative. It is not the approach that is needed to establish more permanent stability.

The Chancellor was right to adopt an approach that sought co-operation, but the policy of intervention is dangerous; it may turn out to be expensive and does not deal with the underlying problems. In the light of what he said this afternoon, I urge my right hon. Friend to concentrate on the problem of co-ordination in a broader and deeper sense—on interest rates and fiscal policy, rather than on intervention. I do not think that it has been effective; it was a change of policy which was not advisable.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the reason why the United States was not willing to intervene in the market to the extent which was initially agreed was that the co-ordination policy of which my right hon. Friend spoke was not in order at that time? Germany and Japan were unwilling to expand their markets sufficiently to enable the United States to resist a further fall in the dollar.

Mr. Higgins: That may well be so. However, the crucial point is that, even if the intervention had been co-ordinated, it may not have succeeded if the underlying factors had not been dealt with.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will give attention to my point about public expenditure, and that we can pursue those issues in the Select Committee. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will continue with a policy that, although hazardous in some respects for the United Kingdom, because of international imbalances, has been vastly preferable to earlier economic policies.

6.42 pm

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): During this debate, and at the time of the Autumn Statement, there has been talk of a national recovery and indeed, in some cases, of an economic miracle. In this debate I wish to present the contrasting situation in my constituency and in many parts of Britain. No economic miracle has yet appeared in those areas and no economic recovery which could be dignified with those terms. We still have a level of economic activity far below what it was in 1979, and a level of unemployment higher than it was in 1979. Therefore, it is an insult to talk in those terms and represents a distortion of what is really happening in Britain.

If the economy is being run with such success, why are we confronted day after day, case after case, with fresh evidence of the squalor, the shoddiness, the injustices and the dangerous undermining of well-tried institutions that are most essential to preserve civilised society in Britain?

I know that many right hon. and hon. Members wish to speak in the debate, but I should like to refer briefly to some of those examples, the most notable of which is the National Health Service, which already has been mentioned in the debate by Opposition Members and others. The presidents of the royal colleges showed that they knew better than the Prime Minister what was happening in the National Health Service.

The right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) made some extremely pointed and important remarks on that subject. However, I should like to give him one warning. The right hon. Gentleman quoted from a particular pamphlet. It was once said of Bernard Shaw that he was a good man who had fallen among Fabians. I hope that the same fate does not befall the right hon. Gentleman, who quoted from a Fabian pamphlet as if it was an authoritative statement on the subject, and I hope that he will think again.

Most of the problems with the National Health Service are not novel. The same problems and calculations existed in 1948 when Aneurin Bevan established the National Health Service. I remember it better than any other hon. Member because I am the only hon. Member here who was present during those controversies. The controversies were about how one would unloose an infinity of demand. Had Bevan listened to those arguments, heeded them, accepted them — they came from so many quarters, from Conservatives, Liberal Benches and Labour Benches — the National Health Service would never have been founded in 1948. We have a Health Service because he said that we must represent the claims of that service above any other area of social services, and because he presented them with such daring, comprehension, understanding and compassion the Treasury was prepared to listen.

The problems are not easily solved now, but the sort of figure that the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North mentioned should be presented to the Cabinet today. Perhaps one of the reasons why the right hon. Gentleman was removed from the Cabinet is that the Prime Minister feared that he would present that argument. I hope that some other members of the Cabinet will do that, but I doubt that they will present it as persuasively as the right hon. Gentleman could present it. If they do not, they will be overwhelmed, because the demand throughout the country is growing strongly all the time. The Government will have to yield. The fact is that £200 million is insufficient. The Government will have to yield much more at the time of the Budget, and the sooner they do that, and the better grace with which they do it, the better it will be for the health of the National Health Service and of the nation.

The National Health Service is not the only example where the screw has been turned. According to the figures, there has been an expansion in the total amounts allocated, but elsewhere — I speak for a constituency where we feel the consequences of those measures — the Government have imposed cuts which are taking effect now. But the Government still dare to talk about a national recovery. During the next few months some of the special cuts that they have inflicted on social security will be brought into operation. They will be applied through discussions such as those that took place yesterday in the House about child benefit.

Other provisions will be applied to cut what many hon. Members believed had been established as the best social services to deal with family problems. Conservative Members have said during the past few days th demand for family allowance was an all-party dem the end of 1945. Child benefit was a great improvem the family allowance. It was consolidated by th Labour Government on a more ambitious scale s child benefit was paid to the mother without any test, and sustained at its original value. All those pri are being undermined by the Government. That is serious matter. It will have serious consequ particularly in areas such as mine where peop dependent on these provisions. The vast increa homelessness in many big cities and in other pla another example. So what is meant by all the tal national recovery?

Then there is what the Government have done many other institutions, including universities. Surel time of technical advance the Robbins principle university education for every boy and girl, ma woman, who can take advantage of it should be c out. That was one of the finest principles that came the second world war. It was accepted by us all. I have thought that it was a civilised principle of th order. The Government have done nothing disgusting than to abrogate that principle. There is competition in that sphere. It is dreadful that peopl themselves have apparently had a first-class educ should introduce measures that will deny a si education to other people who are just as capab benefiting from it. [Interruption.] Let those who wi deny what I say talk to the leaders of the universities people at universities who have been protesting again policies operated by the Government over many mo There is talk of the Government withdrawing some o offensive clauses from the Education Reform Bill. I that they will do so.

Another part of the Government's programme w affects people directly is the extraordinary White P published on Tuesday by Lord Young and Department. Huge sums of taxpayers' money are b used to publicise the document as though it had accepted by the House. When one reads the document realises how taxpayers' money has been misused publicise Lord Young and his Department. explanation I offer to the House is that the document not prepared originally to be presented by Lord You Department but would have been presented by him had been appointed chairman of the Conservative p He seems to have decided that, as he had drawn up document, he might as well get the taxpayers to pay fo

If hon. Members think that I am exaggerating, let t look at page 2, where it is explained that 1979 supposedly the turning point of the century in economic life. Lord Young is not so modest as to thin was a turning point just in the postwar period, but in century. In glorifying his achievements and his prosp Lord Young does not even mention that North sea oil made some contribution to the economy over the past years. That is not even mentioned in the document, wh supposedly describes the whole economic position of country.

The same Lord Young comes forward with propo for changes in regional policy. I am not saying that previous policy was perfect; of course, it was not. Mu cuts imposed under that policy hit areas such as mine. T is why we pleaded with the Government to listen to what we had to say before they introduced a new regional policy.

The idea of having discretionary grants as a substitute for guarantees for different industries is dangerous; it is a principle that is difficult to work sensibly. It is not only we in the Labour party who say that. Three ex-Ministers from the Department of Trade and Industry asked questions about it yesterday—the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) and the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). I have to be careful about applying zoological terms to the right hon. Member for Chingford—if I do, I may get complaints from the Animal Welfare Trust—but when three worms turn on the same afternoon, asking the Minister to look properly at the proposed change, the Government ought to take note.

We are deeply concerned about the Government's proposals in the area I represent. The changes will apply not just to areas which have been badly hit but to considerable parts of Wales, Scotland and the north-east. There should have been much more discussion about how to have a more effective regional policy.

One obvious way which we had worked out and which was being applied in 1978 was special development assistance for the areas which were hardest hit, the areas threatened not just with a 2 or 3 per cent. increase in unemployment but with a doubling of unemployment. Unemployment went up to the then appalling figure of 12 per cent. in areas affected by the steel crisis. But over the next three or four years, under the wonderful recovery programme of the Conservative Government, unemployment went up to over 20 per cent. What we sought to provide under the Labour Government's regional policy was special development assistance over and above the general development area assistance. It worked. There were plans for getting new industry into my area. Other areas too had special development area status. It enabled us to get on with the job of rebuilding, as local authorities and industries are eager to do now. We are determined to rebuild industry. We wish the Government had listened to what we had to say about how a sensible regional policy should be worked out.

Even at this late hour, if only Lord Young can set aside his propaganda leaflets, cannot we have a proper discussion? Most of the affected areas are represented by Labour Members and by Labour local authorities that are passionately eager to join in the task of rebuilding. The idea that local authorities are hostile to trying to get on with this major task is ludicrous. To get more jobs is the number one priority of many local authorities. But, partly because of their insane hatred, detestation or suspicion of local authorities, the Government have not been prepared to join in such activities. I hope the Government will consider that afresh.

That is just another example of how fraudulent is the claim that we have had a national recovery. Whatever else there may have been, it is certainly not a national recovery. Until it is national, the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be more reticent in the claim that he makes for himself and his achievements.

The hon. Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern), with his usual delicacy, properly rebuked the Chancellor for lecturing the Americans. If, at the beginning of the Reagan regime, the Americans had pursued similar policies to those pursued by our Government in 1979, 1980 and 1981 there would not have been a recovery in the United States or throughout the world. The world would have been plunged into an even deeper slump perhaps than in 1929. There would not have been a recovery here. The Chancellor thinks that he governs these things, but he is just the fly on the wheel. He thinks that he makes the wheel go round. What happens in the United States economy is far more important than anything he does. Therefore he should have been a bit more careful about looking back.

Some people prophesied what was going to happen in the American economy. Professor Beckerman, an old fashioned Keynsian—which means that he is absolutely up to date; he has got the policies which the Chancellor is looking for for next month — said way back, as anyone can check, before President Reagan came to office, that of course he would prefer a Democrat to be elected, but the incoming American Administration would not carry through a full monetarist policy, as they were claiming they would. Because tax cuts were popular and public expenditure was not popular, they would carry through, not by intention but by accident, a Keynsian policy of reflation no matter what it might be called.

That is what they did for five or six years, and when the American economy recovered we managed to clutch the coat tails in the last four years. That is what really happened, so it does not become the Chancellor to make a holus-bolus criticism of what Americans may be doing now. The situation may be different, but the idea that economic problems which we have not solved can be solved by encouraging the Americans to go in for a full-scale cut in their deficit is absurd. All that will happen is that there will be the kind of slump that there would have been if the Americans had embarked on that policy six or seven years ago.

This does not mean that I agree with the American policy. I think that they could spend their money much more sensibly. If only they would divert a huge amount of that public expenditure, as they could, from armaments into these other fields, it would be much better for all of us. So I certainly think that we should encourage that. But the suggestion that all economic wisdom rests with the Treasury Bench and the Chancellor of the Exchequer and that all that is necessary is for the Americans to copy what the present Government have been doing is absurd. First of all, they would have to explain which of their policies they wished the Americans to copy—the one that they tried with such appalling results in their first period of office or those that they are following now, although they are trying to conceal the fact that they have come round that far.

I know that several Tory Members are trying to entice them further along that road of sanity and I do not wish to interfere with that process because I think that it could be beneficial for the country as a whole. Some of the benefits of such a policy might eventually get through to the great areas that some of us represent that have seen the tragic failure of the Government to understand what is happening. But Government Members do not come to those areas; they do not know the areas and they do not see what is happening in our places. So we have got to tell them.

In the meantime, I hope that we can stop the Chancellor of the Exchequer preaching to others when he has himself found the right gospel only in the last few weeks. I hope that he will change his habits in a way that may be helpful to us all instead of causing the kind of injury that might follow the sort of prescriptions that he has been giving in the last few years.

7.2 pm

Dr. Charles Goodson-Wickes (Wimbledon): I am honoured to have been called to address the House for the first time. It is a special privilege to be allowed to do so in the debate on the Autumn Statement, which has been delayed nearly as long as this speech.

Sitting under the Strangers Gallery tonight is the Conservative Member for Blaydon between the years 1931 and 1935—not, I hope, the last Tory representative for that area. He has been my friend and political mentor for many years. He tells me that in his day one informed the Whips when it was convenient for one to attend the House. The position seems to have been reversed over the years.

I know that the whole House will join me in wishing my predecessor, Michael Havers, now in another place as Lord Havers of St. Edmondsbury, an early return to robust health. It is widely recognised that during his exceptionally long service as Attorney-General he had a formidable workload the success of which remained largely unrecognised owing to its sensitive nature. The burden clearly took its toll upon his health. I am confident that the House will agree that The Times got it right when it described him recently as "one of the straight men of politics"

—as noble a tribute as any to which any hon. Member could aspire. To achieve the highest office of precedence as Lord Chancellor, with all its constitutional, legal and procedural duties, only to have to lay down the burden shortly thereafter must have been a bitter blow. In wishing him well, I take the opportunity to thank him for his wise counsel. It is a privilege to follow his 17 years of service as Member of Parliament for Wimbledon.

I wish to depart slightly from the usual convention by mentioning also Michael Havers' own predecessor, Sir Cyril Black. A number of hon. Members will remember his service in the House from 1950, when he gained the seat, for 20 years thereafter. He continues to offer unparalleled and unselfish service to the area with which he has so long been associated. I cannot speak too highly of his accumulated wisdom, which he has been kind enough to share with me. To follow two such distinguished Members, both of whom served Wimbledon so well in their different ways, will present a challenge which I address with understandable misgivings.

The constituency of Wimbledon forms the western part of the London borough of Merton and, although in the popular mind it is associated with the village of Wimbledon, it extends very much further, with an agreeable diversity of people and interests. Let nobody think that it is a unformly affluent area free of social and other problems. On the eastern side of the railway, which bisects the constituency, there are areas of relative deprivation as one moves towards the boundary, which runs along the course of the river Wandle.

Merton has a distinguished and interesting history dating from an Iron Age settlement. Henry VI was crowned at Merton priory and, by marriage, the royal connection continues, as the Princess of Wales' father, also in another place, is the lord of the manor of Wimbledon. His forefathers inherited Wimbledon house by descent from Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough. It was one Spencer's predecessors who found himself in disp the inhabitants of Wimbledon in 1864. He pro enclose the common and subsequent protests led t of Parliament vesting it in a specially constituted conservators.

Another parliamentary predecessor of mine, S Peek, played an active part in preserving the "public enjoyment". The present system continu can tell the House that no hard feelings persist. H the unique status of the common and the meth funding are likely to produce difficulties in relatio restructuring of local government finance. But I raising that point with my right hon. Friend the S of State for the Environment on a more suitable o

Wimbledon common has been the site, as we subject, of dispute on many occasions in the past. younger, while Prime Minister, engaged in duellin common, luckily without serious results, bef practice ended in the mid-19th century. The comm from the time of the Restoration, the site of reviews and manoeuvres and both the royal tou and Bisley trace their origins to those events.

The most famous of Wimbledon's inha however, was a sailor, Lord Nelson, who lived at place in the present south Wimbledon, in his ménage à trois with Sir William and Lady Ham was from this house that he left to meet his deat battle of Trafalgar.

Three other distinguished men of Wimbledo William Wilberforce, a pioneering Tory who did s to bring about the abolition of slavery, Baden-Pow wrote his "Scouting for Boys" there, and John I horticultural fame, who, in Merton park, founded the first garden suburbs.

Merton has a long history of learning and t century statute of the same name was repealed 1923. Excellent schools of many types flourish borough, as my right hon. Friend the Chief Secre the Treasury can testify from his personal knowled influence of various religious bodies is a marked po good in the constituency, as is the medical work out at the Atkinson Morley's and Nelson hospita

The constituency is mainly residential with balanced community. The tradition for commer light industry, dating from the snuff mills and the works, established by William Morris, persis flourishes. Several new companies, many with technology element, are moving into the district, such old companies as leather curriers.

The name of Wimbledon is universally associate lawn tennis and, in recent times, it has acquir additional distinction of first division football. other sports from golf to greyhound racing are e and there are also other admirable cultural and opportunities.

I address the House at a time when the fundi functioning of the welfare state has been increasingly into question. One of the privileges sha all hon. Members is the opportunity to see at first ha immense amount of voluntary activity, often un nised, carried out in the service of others. Basic h instinct to help those most vulnerable in society is re in this voluntary work and in the financial contrib from so many. I like the term "community self- analogous with the concept of individual self-help.

is nothing novel about that. After all, many of our great hospitals and educational establishments started life as charitable institutions.

Although it would be naive to suggest that the private sector and voluntarily raised finance could solve the present difficulties, they nevertheless have their part to play. I see no ideological bar to such funds supplementing the welfare state and hope that there would be universal support for that. A move in this direction would go some way towards satisfying the recent call made by the presidents of three of the royal medical colleges for "additional and alternative funding in the National Health Service".

I noted with interest the arguments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) in that context.

I speak from some small experience, having been involved with a charity set up in my father's name, which has my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) as president. Among other things, we have provided funds for beds and living accommodation for the families of critically ill children to stay in National Health Service hospitals at times of anxiety. Only this week, we have contributed to the renovation of an underused building at Bart's. That hospital, where I trained, was founded over 850 years ago and it seems illogical that an organisation such as the National Health Service, established barely 40 years ago, should be expected to cope unaided with today's unlimited demands.

If charities, which now have an annual turnover in excess of £10 billion a year, are to play their full part in our society, two requirements must be satisfied—first, the incentives for giving should be increased and, secondly, the funds gathered should be used as efficiently as possible.

On the first point, I must congratulate the Government on their success over the past eight years in creating a climate favourable to charities. The 1986 measures have been described as the best charity Budget that we have ever had. The extension of tax relief to companies for one-off gifts was a major step forward. These are early days yet for the payroll giving scheme for individuals, but many employers, including central Government Departments, have set up the appropriate machinery. However, a new publicity boost is needed from the Government to increase general awareness of the scheme and to spur on charities and their agencies to take advantage of it. Provided that the administrative burden is not too great, income tax relief for individuals on single gifts might also be arranged in due course.

My second point is to urge the implementation of last year's Woodfield report. The inadequacies which it identified in the supervision of charities must be remedied. The question of registration should be tackled to go beyond the endorsement or otherwise of submitted statements of charitable aims. A very small number of cases of abuse taint the image of charities in general. Unfortunately, there are cases of bodies claiming tax relief for non-charitable purposes, fraud or tax avoidance. A requirement for charities to submit annual accounts must be sensible and these should also be made available to the public.

Although I am aware of the practical objections raised on both sides of the House, I also urge the Chancellor to reconsider possible sanctions to discourage the accumulation of funds. Such accumulations may be perfectly proper, but there have been cases of idleness on the part of trustees and there is always a potential danger in the practice which I have heard described as "money looking for trouble to happen".

It seems ludicrous that the Charity Commission, which has done such valuable work, has inadequate resources, both financially and professionally, to inspect annual accounts and to investigate possible wrongdoing. I am sure that my right hon. Friend would share my reluctance to advocate increased Government expenditure on this matter and perhaps much work, historically done without charge by the commission, could be contracted out, with better use being made of existing resources. The introduction of a modest registration fee, possibly renewable annually, would not be unreasonable. That would be in the interests of good administration and the production of revenue.

As the Inland Revenue has the power to disclose prima facie abuse to the commission, staff must obviously be redeployed to adjust to modern-day circumstances. Although a modernised Charity Commission might well pay for itself by preventing unjust fiscal claims, that argument would not in isolation carry weight with the Treasury.

Such enlightened Government measures would greatly increase the scope for co-operation between the public, private and voluntary sectors for the good of the population as a whole. I hope to play some small, but effective, part in furthering this end.

7.18 pm

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): The House will have enjoyed the speech of the hon. Member for Wimbledon (Dr. Goodson-Wickes) and the way he spoke about his predecessor who was a highly respected Member of the House. It will have enjoyed what he had to say about his constituency and it will also have noted the expertise with which he spoke about charities. No doubt we shall hear much from him in the future. However, there is just one issue which I wish to take up with him. Speaking as a Member for the north-east, I can assure him that there will not be another Tory Member of Parliament for Blaydon.

As we pointed out in the Treasury and Civil Service Committee report, the Budget judgments for this year will be made against a highly disturbed and turbulent international background. Indeed, they are the most turbulent since 1979-80, the years of the second oil shock. We can all agree that it is extremely difficult to predict the consequences of the sharp fall in the stock market in the last two weeks of October. For one thing, markets all over the world continue to be extremely unsettled, but we heard nothing about that from the Chancellor. We should have done.

Also, the response of the policy-makers in the main industrial economies has been extremely hesitant and uncertain. The coming of the American presidential election has already had an impact on the United States, but it is not only the United States which has been slow to act. Other countries have also been adopting a highly cautious approach, particularly the West German Government, who seem to be very unclear about what action they should be taking. Yet West Germany has an obvious responsibility as a major trading nation, with a balance of payments surplus equivalent to 4 per cent. of its GNP.

[Mr. Giles Radice]

The empty G7 statement just before Christmas was a sign of the confusion and uncertainty in the seven major industrial countries about what to do next. However, despite the difficulties about long-term predictions, the House should note that the latest report from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development has already forecast that, as a consequence of the October crash, international economic activity will be significantly weakened. It also says that unemployment in OECD countries will begin to rise again.

The OECD report is particularly concerned about the impact on industrial and consumer confidence which could lead to a downturn in both investment and spending with the inevitable consequences for growth and employment — very much a classic Keynesian picture. Significantly, it warns policy-makers about the risk of a world recession. I should have thought that the Chancellor would at least have had the courtesy to mention that warning from a body of which the United Kingdom is a member. It is a risk which the Chancellor typically dismisses far too lightly.

With all the turbulence and uncertainty around, there might be a case for expressing some sympathy for the Chancellor as he prepares for the Budget if he were not so insufferably complacent, confident and cocky about the prospects for the British economy, and, more especially, about his own performance as Chancellor of the Exchequer.

It is true, and it is a good thing, that in 1987 our growth rate, at 4 per cent., has been faster than most of the rest of Europe. It is also welcome news that unemployment has been falling over the past 18 months, albeit assisted by changes in the way that the unemployed are registered. However, the forecast for growth in the Autumn Statement is only for 2·5 per cent. in 1988 and there are some signs that much of that growth will be bunched in the early part of the year. Lower growth, whatever the Autumn Statement says, is likely to mean higher unemployment. I note that the OECD report predicts that the pace of growth in the United Kingdom may not be sufficient "to prevent the rate of unemployment from rising again."

That is a very different message from the Chancellor's this afternoon.

The Chancellor's dilemma is that, if unemployment is to continue to fall significantly, and if regional differences are to be reduced, we shall need growth rates somewhat above 3 per cent. over the next three years. Yet the growing balance of payments and trade deficit is a factor that must make any Chancellor cautious about increased rates of expansion. That is a genuine dilemma that the Chancellor must face. Yet he makes these things far more difficult, not only for himself but for the British economy, by three aspects of his economic policy.

First, the Chancellor has made it clear that he is firmly committed to further income tax cuts in his Budget. Yet income tax cuts are, as all the models show, the least effective way in which to boost employment. They would almost certainly suck in more imports at a time when our balance of payments deficit is predicted to deteriorate.

Then there is the Government's posture on public spending and their highly cautious stance on the PSBR — more cautious in the Autumn Statement than was predicted. That stance means that infrastructure projects, regional policies, and key social programs health and education will all be deprived funds. The Chancellor forgets the importa well-targeted public spending is a safer way our balance of payments, bringing down un and keeping growth going.

There is a third problem. As the American well, the obvious way to tackle a balance deficit and to assist manufacturing is by Indeed, the 1986 British devaluation provide assistance to our economy. However, sinc pound has increased in value by over 10 per Chancellor's policy is to tie the pound firmly particularly to the deutschmark. In doing s rules out any further dev[illegible]on in the near fu context, he should note the point made by Minister in an interview in the Financia November, when she warned that gearing the deutschmark was likely to be deflationary. Th a difference between the Prime Ministe Chancellor on that point.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spald remarks, does the hon. Gentleman take any ac extreme difficulty that we have had recently in the pound from appreciating above three de How on earth can we contemplate pursuing a for parity at present, even if we wished to do simply appalling monetary consequences?

Mr. Radice: That point has already been an must bring interest rates down. Our interest Chancellor pointed out to the Select Com higher than most of those of our main competi to three points and there is no reason why they be lower.

However, I draw some comfort from how Chancellor's policies have changed since 1979 been mentioned by several of my hon. Friend the Chancellor was the inventor of the m financial strategy. However, monetary con virtually abandoned in October 1985. He used the Labour Government for their irresponsibili the past 18 months he has manufactured a consumer boom, fuelled by a remarkable d savings ratio—I think from 7 per cent. to 5 disguised fiscal relaxation and earnings rising inflation.

It is not an Opposition invention to say that old consumer boom. The Chancellor himsel Select Committee that the present rate of g unsustainable and above our historic levels. It w a good reason — the Chancellor was m contribution to the Conservative party winning election.

Even on public spending, there has been a hon. Members may remember that the object reduce public expenditure in volume terms. The hold public spending constant in real terms. N reduce public spending as a proportion of GDP. marginal changes, but they are changes in direction. There is also the famous change on the rate policy. My right hon. and learned Friend th for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) noted Chancellor used to say that exchange rates sho to the market, but he now believes in manage and international intervention, although, as the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) pointed out, he does not do that very effectively.

The former hard-line monetarist, the man who really invented the Government's strategy back in 1979, is becoming increasingly pragmatic. Like my right hon. and learned Friend, I welcome the Chancellor's conversion. I welcome his changes and over the next few weeks and months, and for however long he remains Chancellor—I understand that he wants to be Foreign Secretary—we all look forward to further changes in a more sensible direction.

7.29 pm

Mr. Leon Brittan (Richmond, Yorks): My first and pleasant task is to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wimbledon (Dr. Goodson-Wickes) on his maiden speech. He began with an elegant and apposite tribute to our former colleague, Lord Havers. I am sure that we would all wish to be associated with everything he said and, in particular, with the good wishes for his return to health. We were then given a conducted tour of Wimbledon which left even those of us who thought we knew the place infinitely better informed than we had been before. Finally, my hon. Friend made a perceptive and constructive speech about the relationship between the welfare state and the voluntary sector, and put forward a number of important suggestions which, I am sure, merit consideration. In all, if I may borrow a phrase from his constituency, he served an ace and we look forward to many more.

Looking at the Autumn Statement so long after its publication, we inevitably feel that it has a slightly antique flavour about it. But it is none the less remarkable for all that, because it is an account of strong but soundly based growth with the prospects for substantial further growth and falls in unemployment—and, by implication, more tax cuts. The decisions announced in it are, of course, the public spending ones arrived at after a period of intense haggling, which anyone who has been Chief Secretary looks back on with a mixture of nostalgia and relief that those days are over.

Although the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) seemed not to give sufficient weight to this fact in the earlier part of his remarks, the Autumn Statement shows an increase in spending for 1988-89 and 1989-90 of £2·6 billion and £5·6 billion respectively compared with the figures announced last year. The growth in Government expenditure in real terms, excluding privatisation proceeds, is expected to be 1·25 per cent. a year over four years

Those who might have anxieties about the implication of such an increase in public spending, after a period when the stated aim had been to hold expenditure roughly flat, are reassured in the Autumn Statement by the argument that public expenditure will at least continue to fall as a proportion of the nation's income over the next three years. When one takes into account the fact that, last year, the plans for this year were increased by £4·75 billion, the further increases in spending amount to significant relaxations in the public expenditure objectives of the Government.

Nevertheless, in the context of a rapidly expanding economy, my own view is that the Government's present proposals are still consistent with a generally sound financial posture. However, it is against that background that we must consider the implications of the Aut Statement and subsequent developments for future p — in particular, for the forthcoming Budget. Autumn Statement forecasts growth of 2·5 per cent. year and £1 billion of PSBR for the current financial and assumes a similar PSBR for next year, althoug actual PSBR is to be set in the Budget.

Looking forward rather than backward, the question seems to me to be: have recent events at hom abroad, and possible developments in prospect, cha the situation in a way that should influence Chancellor's judgment? I think they have. I agree wi heartedly with the conclusion of the Governor of the of England that the need for caution is now paramo I add that caution makes good sense politically, too. were, after all, re-elected only a few months ago an have a whole Parliament in which to achieve our objectives.

We have always acted on the principle in the past we would implement those objectives as and when could afford to do so. I am sure that we would be wi continue to follow that principle. By all means let u what we can safely do this year, but in a yea international turbulence, the domestic consequence which are still not clear, financial prudence should, a all else, be our watchword. Much can change in the few weeks, but for the moment the objective of a neg PSBR would seem the right one to set.

This conclusion flows from considering both the w scene and the domestic economy. The internati position needs to be examined first, because it is there the uncertainties are greatest. What happens in the Un States is crucial. There have been excruciatingly pai efforts in the United States to reduce the budget de ending up with a cut at the lowest level needed to persu the markets that the United States is even remotely ser about tackling its problems. Since then, some forec have emanated from the United States suggesting spending will actually be greater than envisaged and the cut in the deficit will be correspondingly low. It is c that there is not the slightest intention of the increas interest rates that is needed to go along with the cut in budget deficit. It is not surprising that that should b in an election year, but it is an important fact in the t equation.

Worst of all, in terms of confidence in the market the continued insouciance shown by the United St administration, with the President, but a few days saying that the trade deficit is a sign of the strength of United States' economy.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): That is what Minister said.

Mr. Brittan: It is not surprising that it has nee herculean efforts on the part of the world's central ba at great cost, to keep the dollar even at its present le Nor is it surprising that the financial community considerable doubts about whether those efforts can successful in anything other than the short term, in absence of an appropriate policy to deal with underlying problems.

When I was at the Treasury between 1981 and 1983 we faced complaints about the high value of the pound. always said that the exchange rate could not be altered intervention on any permanent basis, and that all we co do was to smooth out short-term fluctuations.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North) rose——

Mr. Brittan: I am inclined to believe that that is just as true today of current attempts to prop up the dollar. Although the dollar may have fallen far enough already, there inevitably remains a real risk of further irresistible pressure on it and a further fall in the United States stock market. There is no way in which we can insulate ourselves against that, so that is the first main reason for adopting a cautious fiscal stance.

I reject the idea that we should try to spend or borrow our way out of a recession that has not come and, if it did, would be extraneously induced. I suggest that the same cautious conclusion emerges from an examination of the United Kingdom economy. I do not accept that the fall in share prices has had a deflationary effect, or that it will have one, and that therefore we should now adopt a more expansionary policy than would otherwise be desirable. One might reasonably have expected that the fall in the stock market and the fear of further falls would have had that effect, but all the signs are that that has proved not to be the case. There are no signs of a significant lessening of economic activity; expansion is continuing at a rapid rate in all parts of the United Kingdom, including the assisted regions.

It is interesting to see the Lloyds bank economic bulletin, entitled "Limited Impact of Equity Slump", which contains a careful analysis of the so-called wealth effect and comes to the conclusion that it has proved to be extremely limited.

Another commentator makes the point that the exceptional growth in the second half of 1987 — annualised GDP growth of 5 to 7 per cent. — has a carry-over effect into 1988 so strong that, with no further growth at all, growth would be 2 per cent. in 1988 for that reason alone; with continuing growth, 3 per cent. to 3·5 per cent. is the probable total for the current year. Moreover, the stock market effect — if it had a deflationary effect — has already been counteracted by the 1·5 per cent. reduction in interest rates. There are already significant labour shortages in certain industries in parts of the country. That underlines the need for a vigorous regional policy — but that is a matter for another day. Looking at the whole picture, I believe that the domestic risk against which the Government must guard is not recession but the further build-up of inflationary pressures. For those reasons, domestic and international, I come out strongly on the side of those urging caution in the preparation of the Budget.

However, on the figures in the Autumn Statement, even with caution, there is likely to be some scope for tax reductions, and certainly opportunity for tax reform. Political momentum in favour of moving to 25p basic rate and reduction of top rates to 50p is now probably irresistible, but its timing must depend on what is consistent with a prudent PSBR target.

One way of enabling more money to be available for tax reductions than would otherwise be possible would be to restrict tax allowances to the basic rate. Indeed, there is a great deal to be said for also limiting mortgage interest relief and pension relief to the basic rate. If all that were done, £1·75 billion would become available for tax reductions.

Much of that money may be needed to deal with the problem of the tax treatment of married women, depending on precisely how that is done. However, I am sure that the Chancellor appreciates structural problem, the resolution of delayed any longer. The feeling of in present arrangements is now overwhelm think that the Government's original with this had very much more to comme critics have allowed.

Beyond that, and maybe beyond Budget, I would make the top priority th increase in personal allowances to take possible, at the lower end of the inco income tax altogether. That is desirable First, it is, of course, the people at the scale for whom tax is now the greatest

Secondly, it is the obligation to pay ta which is the main cause of the poverty t that can be done to make it more worth w to stay on the dole is intensely desirable. low earnings out of tax altogether mean can take on more people and further r ment, for the simple reason that the mo afford to pay will not be so reduced by longer higher than the dole.

If the main economic and social prob face, particularly in certain parts of the unemployment, the top priority of fiscal take people out of tax and stimulate em way, provided always that that can be do of a reasonable fiscal policy.

To allow inflation to start up again wo to the economy, no service to the unemp to the Government, no service to the Co and no service to the country.

7.42 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and S like to add my voice to the tributes that h the hon. Member for Wimbledon (Dr. C for his successful maiden speech. The H with what he said about his predecessor, popular Member. Those who know his Wimbledon will share his sentiments enti his contribution and look forward to h again.

I join my right hon. and learned Friend Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) in feeli disappointment at the Chancellor's speec the debate. It was a mistake for the Chanc the entire subject matter of the Autumn Chief Secretary who is to reply, rathe himself an analysis, defence and general s of the Autumn Statement for which, aft prime responsibility.

I listened, of course, to what the Chan the international economic scene. I acce great difficulties in reaching any certain j the likely course of events. However, I ag Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) a hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gw because I do not see much sense or pro from publicly upbraiding America for th of its economic policy when the United St principal engine of world economic gr years. Any significant reduction in the should, at least, be accompanied by increases in the growth activity of the grea of Japan and West Germany. If we were seriously to urge on the Americans dramatic movements in cutting their trade deficit and their budget deficit without corresponding and compensatory movements towards expansion by the other major industrial countries of the western world, we should have a recipe for a major slump and recession, which would not be confined to the western world but would, of course, embrace Third world countries, which have appalling suffering.

I am sorry that the Chancellor could not remain in the Chamber until he had heard the end of my speech. Nevertheless, I am glad that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury has heard what I have said and I hope that my sentiments will be conveyed to the Chancellor.

There are two or three crucial and indisputable facts about our present economic and social situation. The first is clearly stated in the Autumn Statement. The growth in GDP that we have enjoyed during the past year is forecast to slow down considerably in the year ahead. That does not conflict with the forecasts of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and others. The forecast of a falling-away of growth applies not only to Britain, but to virtually all the other countries in the western world and it is one principal source of our concern. It is clear that unless something else happens, growth will slow down. That will mean an end to the gradual reduction in unemployment and it is perfectly possible that there could be a reversal of the current trend. That is fact number one.

Fact number two is that the Autumn Statement forecasts—correctly, I am sure—the elimination of the public sector borrowing requirement. It is true that it will be the first time since 1970 that we have moved into surplus on the budget account. That is a remarkable change. However, the way in which that has come about might merit considerable discussion in the House.

My explanation of what has happened is that during the past 18 months there has been a significant increase in Government public expenditure, which has been only partially disguised by the sale of public assets. At the same time, there has been an obvious and notable decrease in taxation and a considerable fall in the exchange rate, especially in the earlier months. Surprise, surprise—the economy expands when one cuts taxation, increases public expenditure and lowers the exchange rate. Of course that is what happens, but for the past eight years the Treasury Bench has failed to understand that when one achieves expansion, one gets buoyancy in revenue, which means that the money that one thought that one had borrowed is more than covered by receipts from the increased economic activity. That is what the entire Keynesian argument is about. There are certainly criticisms of it and, although there are lessons to be learnt, it should not be carried too far. However, it is much more rewarding than the awful arid doctrines of monetarism which simply squeeze the life out of the economy while hoping that somehow spontaneous regeneration will occur. The elimination of the PSBR is, thus, the second point.

The third fact, which I think has impinged itself on all hon. Members and, indeed, on everyone in the country, is that two of our social services are going through a period of obvious crisis. The National Health Service has been referred to by many speakers, not only in this debate but virtually from the time the House resumed after the recess. I will say nothing more about it except that I agree entirely with the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), the Chairman of the Treasury and Civil Serv Committee, who pointed out that the growth r terms is at most 1·2 per cent. That will not be ad the needs of the Health Service, where a massiv of funds on the scale mentioned by the former the House, the right hon. Member for Shropsh (Mr. Biffen), is almost certainly required.

Another social service of great importan people is rented housing, where we are talking the inadequacy of growth but of devasta destruction that has not been compensated by building in the private sector. There has not increase in overall housebuilding in Britain. T eighth year in which the total has fallen well belo in every year during the 1970s.

Mr. Winnick: I am grateful to my right hon. giving way. Is he aware that just before the recess, I received a reply from a junior en Minister saying that as far as the Governm concerned it was no longer the function of local a to build. Bearing in mind the thousands of waiting lists throughout the country, and the bed-and-breakfast and hostel accommodation, absolutely disgraceful that for the first time in years local authorities have been told that they need to build?

Mr. Shore: It is the logic of the situation authorities can no longer be responsible if they the resources. Let us look at the figures. T produced in the Autumn Statement on public spe for expenditure on housing of £3,020 million. In 1988 cash value terms, we were spending more th million in 1978-79. That is a fall in the housing pr of 60 per cent.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud) rose——

Mr. Shore: I shall not give way to the hon. G at the moment.

It will surprise no one to learn that both compl new starts in public sector rented housing in the have been 30,000, whereas in 1978 starts were 10 completions were 130,000. If anyone wants to k we have an army of homeless and such disconte estates, there is the reason. There has been total housing provision and an obsession with ownership.

I have put together three facts which are pre incontrovertible. The first fact is that we shall ha down in growth over the next year. Secondly, we PSBR deficit; indeed, we have a surplus for the in 17 years. Thirdly, we have two obvious cris essential public social services which cater for thi our people. Surely there has never been opportunity for the Chancellor to act, for once, cl responsibly in the interests of the British peop Chancellor felt when he presented the Autumn S last year that a PSBR of 1 per cent. of gross product, a mere £4 billion, was prudent to the great praise for himself, why should not a simil in the coming year be equally prudent? Would mean that resources of the order of £6 billio become available?

As many right hon. and hon. Members hav would be folly if such resources were flung into c purchasing power. Some contribution could be made there, but to dispense large sums of money to private consumers, knowing perfectly well that that would fuel an expenditure explosion or an increase in imports, would be folly. However, there would be no folly at all in spending more money on the Health Service and on the building and construction industries, both of which have a very low import content. Such expenditure would also give enormous help to many people who are in desperate need of adequate health care and decent accommodation.

I must say to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury that there cannot have been many such opportunities where circumstances have been so united for doing good things. They are now in the hands of the Treasury, and we hope that they will be exploited in the Budget of 1988.

7.56 pm

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): One of my first observations in my brief remarks concerns what right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House have been saying about the way in which we could distribute the additional money that the economy is earning. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor and his team have managed to expand our economy so that there is money available for the Health Service and indeed the social services and housing, about which the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) has spoken.

Mr. Knapman: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind the remarks of the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), who referred to homelessness? Would it not help the plight of the homeless if certain Labour councils with 10 per cent. of their council houses empty got round to letting those houses?

Mr. Wells: That is a very good point, but I was congratulating my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on the way in which he has conducted the economy so that we have surpluses available to spend in this way. Indeed, it is a great credit to him that this wonderful situation has been brought about by careful and sensible financial policies.

I want to help the Chancellor in relation to the international scene. He opened the debate on that subject. It is in the international setting, as the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) said, where, if we get it wrong and the United States economy goes wrong, we shall not be able to resist the forces of depression in this country if the economics of the world contract.

The issue causing me to detain the House this evening is my concern at the serious lack of analysis of the international financial situation that was displayed particularly by the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), on the occasion of the stock market crash and the subsequent Opposition Supply Day debate.

I thought that the right hon. and learned Gentleman conducted the debate in a frivolous manner that was most unhelpful in seeing a solution to the serious domestic and international difficulties that we faced at that time. On that occasion speaker after eminent speaker claimed that the financial markets would not stabilise until after the United States budget deficit had been reduced substantially. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) made this point delicately—as the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent said Chancellor this evening in taking Mansion House speech.

Once such an event as the st occurred, we were assured that th would stabilise and the stock m Undoubtedly, the United States bu cause of imbalance in the internati for some time, but in the years tha it has caused stock markets to r heights in this country and indeed The value of the dollar has risen s deficit has been the principal re economy began to grow from 1981 the right hon. It was a major cau States trade imbalance because its v of falling, as a budget deficit woul suggested it should do, and wh commentators would say was inevi very serious calls for protectioni American manufacturers faced wit competitive foreign goods on thei international, markets and their ina both in domestic and overseas mar

If the United States budget def 1987, how can it be argued that si United States deficit we will ga exchange rate stability and conti Undoubtedly, if the United States h calls for a drastic cut in the budget United States would have slowed d the United States economy into reces would have made it very difficult to States, and slump would have hi trading partners, Japan, Britain and a scenario would have been disastrou economy.

If we look at the current con economy, we cannot be self-satisfi major unemployment and serious productive capacity. The markets of t Latin America and Europe's Africa down because of their chronic indebt of exports from Europe or the United there. Only the markets of the far ea trade, where fierce competition betwe States, Britain and western Europe it resulting in trade on a very marg base. If, on top of this, we close down trade between the United States, Japan and western Europe by putting the United States into recession, we shall certainly face a worldwide slump.

It is widely argued that the way out of these difficulties is to enable the world economy to expand without overheating into inflation. How is this to be done? It will not happen automatically; it must be managed. As Paul Volcker rightly said, money will not manage itself, and certainly international money will not. It is equally certain that if one does not manage money, others will manage it for one. I agree with Lord Lever who, in an article in the United States publication "The International Economy", says:

"Yo-yo currencies are fundamentally incompatible with a liberal and prosperous, interdependent global economy. The most important condition for a return to greater world progress and trade expansion is the establishment of a system of collective disciplines for the management of the exchange rates of the world's major currencies and especially that of the dollar."

I support wholeheartedly the Chancellor's efforts to co-ordinate policies in the world and, in particular, the measures that he outlined in his speech this afternoon. One thing that he left out of his analysis, however, was the issue of debt, yet my right hon. Friend is the most innovative Chancellor and the most imaginative Finance Minister on the world stage at present in putting forward his suggestion of how African indebtedness should be dealt with.

He has suggested that the world's indebtedness may be dealt with, especially as regards Africa, where there is very little hope of repayment, by converting present public indebtedness—that is, Government loans—to grants, by reducing interest rates and by extending the indebtedness of those countries so that repayment can take place over a much longer period, with the repayment being related to the economic capacity of a country to earn its living and service its debt.

My right hon. Friend has met with little encouragement from trading partners such as West Germany and the United States, but he should persist in his attempts to persuade both the United States in relation to the Latin American debt, and West Germany and Japan in relation to other indebtedness, to enable that reorganisation of the indebtedness of Third world countries so that trading can be resumed, markets can be opened up in those countries and we can thereby begin a world expansion in trade which will result in the reduction of unemployment in our own economies and the beginning of the expansion once more of the very impoverished nations of the world on which we impact. Unless we also look at that debt issue and get it put right, we will not see the world expansion in trade that we all desperately need.

It is by the combination of policies, the co-ordination of policies and the management of policies that we shall expand world trade, prevent recession and prevent the recurrence of inflation, which is an undoubted scourge on all our economies.

There are certain points which need, therefore, to be addressed in trying to achieve that co-ordination of policies that will benefit us all. First, there must be expansion of the German and Japanese economies, and trade with all countries. Their economies must permit imports from those of us who are able to supply them, and so there must be a dramatic reduction in tariff barriers, and a GATT round, designed for that purpose, must be hurried up and made effective. There must b reduction of the United States deficit, and rates here in Europe and in the United State investment; a stabilisation of currency rela massive debt rescheduling to permit tr underdeveloped economies of the world.

We must support the international or their attempts to make certain that the economic policies, designed to produce w activity in Third world countries—and th condition of any rescheduling in which we Those international organisations—the Wo the International Monetary Fund — strengthened to provide the money for that the disciplines necessary for those Third wo to prevent them going once more indebtedness.

We must also reduce agricultural su developed world so as to increase the possi with the Third world countries which ma agricultural commodities and which are un because of agricultural subsidy regimes.

Given those conditions, and working toge see an expansion of world trade and so a commodity prices, with the result that the trading system will benefit and we shall be expanded economy, able to afford health social services without indulging in oversp public sector.

simple: far from experiencing an economic miracle, we have an economy which is still growing more slowly than it did under the much reviled Labour Government whom the Chancellor likes to attack when under fire. Manufacturing output has only just returned to its 1979 level and manufacturing investment is still almost 10 per cent. lower than it was in 1979 when the Government came to power. Our manufacturing trade deficit is at an all-time record and our balance of payments has been deteriorating rapidly. As if this year's news were not bad enough, the Autumn Statement makes it plain that there is worse news for next year. On the Government's own calculations, the Treasury expects slower growth, higher inflation and a worse balance of payments this year than we had last year —all of this in spite of the fact that the Government have had the benefit of £60 billion of oil revenues.

How, then, can the Chancellor continue to boast of economic and industrial success? I do not believe that it is just because the Chancellor is a stupid man, although from time to time it strikes me that if he left his brain for scientific purposes the scientific community of Britain would contest the will. It is not just because he is an obstinate man — although, God knows, he is that as well. It is not merely that he is apparently ignorant of the social consequences of his policies. The fact is that the Chancellor has managed to combine all three characteristics—stupidity, ignorance and obstinacy—in a manner almost unparalleled since Marie Antoinette. It is almost unbelievable that, with a windfall of that magnitude, this Chancellor should have created such a manufacturing deficit—not for the first time in 30 years, but for the first time in Britain's industrial history.

It is because of the combination of the Chancellor's blindness to the consequences of his policies and his failure to realise the suffering that they have caused that he can boast about his fiscal policy, among other things. The Government's fiscal policy has been marked by two characteristics. First, it has been socially divisive and, secondly, it has increasingly diverted the burden of taxation away from those best able to afford it on the backs of those least able to afford it.

The Chancellor may not have departmental responsibility for the poll tax, but it is the child of his philosophy because it meets the two criteria that I have outlined. Not only is that tax grossly unfair, highly inefficient and thoroughly regressive, but its effects on millions of people in Scotland have been intentionally underestimated in Government propaganda. The truth is that the poll tax will not remain at the £250 per head that the Government have suggested. According to figures produced by the Library, assuming that the new business rate will be held steady in real terms—the Government tell us that it will—and that the cuts made in central funding to the local authorities over the past five years will continue, at 1986 prices the poll tax will be running at £450 a head in real terms in a very short time. That is one further act whose genesis lies in the fiscal policies based on the Chancellor's philosophy.

I refer briefly to the Chancellor's public policies. If he does not believe that there is a crisis in the National Health Service, let him speak to nurses and ancillary workers at Hartwood hospital. I understand that through the howls of disbelief at her statements on the National Health Service, the Prime Minister today challenged hon. Members with constituents who are nurses or ancillary workers who are holding a token strike to condemn that action. I shall respond to the Prime Minister's challenge. It is the height of hypocrisy for Margaret Thatcher of all Prime Ministers to ask us to condemn people who have committed their lives to the Health Service, who pursue a profession that has had a tradition of non-militancy for 100 years but who have been pushed to action that they regard as extreme for the sole purpose of safeguarding patient care.

On 15 March—the ides of March—the Chancellor will have the chance to prove that the Government really care for the National Health Service. If he does not take that opportunity to use part of the supposed £3 billion surplus to meet the inadequacies of the Health Service, we shall have a historic repetition of the events of the ides of March. "Et tu, Nigel?" may not have the same classical ring as "Et tu, Brute?" but there will be some classical justification for it if another supposed friend of the National Health Service sticks another dagger into its heart.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): The world economy has been passing through an extremely dangerous phase, and continues to do so. Unlike the hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid), I feel that we owe my right hon. Friend the Chancellor a vote of confidence for the skill with which he has so far steered us through these dangerous and challenging rapids. His troubles are certainly not over yet, as I shall explain in a moment. Now that Paul Volcker has departed from the scene, my right hon. Friend's judgment will become increasingly central in world financial circles. He will be turned to increasingly and that will be a heavy responsibility, which I believe he will carry with skill and experience.

I said that my right hon. Friend's troubles were not yet over, because the worst is yet to come. In the 1930s, following the financial crash, many said, "That is just financial. We can all relax. The economy is fundamentally sound." Our position today is not dissimilar and the same pattern could unfold if we are not careful. The reason has less to do with our own affairs than with the fact that the United States economy is in an extremely fragile, indeed rotten, state. Despite the superficial signs of prosperity —job performance and the increasing exports to which my right hon. Friend referred—that economy is riddled through with debt of every kind.

Tomorrow's trade figures may be a little better. They will merely confirm what is obvious to some of us, although not to some Opposition Members: one cannot devalue one's way to salvation in trade any more than one can do so in any other activity. The trade figures will probably not be appalling, but they will not be very good.

Tomorrow's trade figures will tell us nothing. The United States economy is burdened not only with the debts of the developing countries about which my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Ms. Wells) spoke so eloquently but, more seriously, with a mass of farm debts, energy bad debts, over-borrowing by consumers on a scale far greater even than in this country and, above all, a mass of bad debt arising from the huge speculative borrowing that went on throughout spring and summer last year to finance junk bond arrangements and leverage-managed buy-outs. The present situation is the legacy of that period, which some hon. Members seem to think was a good period for United States economic policy. The true legacy consists of borrowing and debt on a most fearsome scale, which are bound to mean that the American economy remains deeply sick.

All this will mean that the recession, which will come anyway, will be prolonged. I differ from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor only in that respect. Of course, he is right to suggest that this economy is in a strong position in a dangerous world. However, he is too sanguine about the prospects of recession arising from what is coming quite soon in the America economy. As happened in the 1930s—the present situation is not dissimilar—we have a mass of bad debt that will never be repaid and that will lead banks increasingly to seek loans of higher quality and to try to squeeze out those stuck with unrepayable loans.

Neither the clichéd traditional policies of Keynesianism recommended by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) nor monetary policy have much power to exert a counteractive influence. There often comes a stage—this was very much so in the early 1930s—when a monetary policy that has been relevant during several stages of the cycle ceases to be an effective instrument. Keynes described it as like pushing on a piece of string, trying to counteract the recessionary forces of a debt-ridden world — particularly a debt-ridden United States economy — by monetary expansion and an injection of additional money and liquidity.

That is the reality, and those who think that we are over the financial crisis and that there will be a calm phase when everything will gradually pull together are living in cloud cuckoo land. The dangers are as great as ever, if not more so. Our task in our part of the global economy is to do everything responsibly and to manage our small ship in the colossal storms that are all around us and are still coming over the horizon.

The first thing that we must do—we have already done some things that were necessary—is recognise the limitations of our position and avoid following the Americans into debt-ridden disaster. We must avoid accumulating more debts. Luckily, we are in a stronger position than the Americans were in the 1930s, just as the Americans are in a much weaker position. In the 1930s, the United States was a creditor country, but now it is one of the world's biggest debtor countries. We had some credits in the 1930s, but they were dying away. Today we are a strong, major creditor nation.

We must do everything possible to preserve that, internally and externally, and to maintain a creditor position. That means avoiding debt in terms of the Autumn Statement and the issues immediately ahead for the Budget, and it means that we must pursue a policy of a tight Budget. By a tight Budget I mean a balanced one, I understand from the excellent report of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and his colleagues that when the Chancellor speaks of a balanced Budget he means a borrowing requirement of about 1 per cent. of GDP. That is probably sensible — a little borrowing covering some but not all of Government capital spending and revenues covering certainly all current spending.

If the Chancellor follows that policy with a tight and balanced Budget consistent with the picture that I have painted of an extremely dangerous world, it could make room for £3 billion or £4 billion-worth of tax cuts or increased expenditure. We have heard different views on which it should be, but I believe that tax cuts produce increased revenue. Cutting taxes has produced a vast increase in revenue from VAT, corporate taxation and income tax. Out of that can and should come the additional resources that should be spread to the vulnerable parts of the economy and to the major public and social services that we need.

If Opposition Members think that there is a policy choice — that we can have either tax cuts or public expenditure increases — they are living in a world of muddle. Tax cuts will generate the wealth that will enable us decently to finance vital public services and raise family living standards through individual effort.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howell: No, there is not time.

In the Chancellor's own words, there is room for substantial tax cuts within the balanced budget strategy.

Should we go for higher interest rates? I cannot understand that view. Every time that interest rates go up, they add to the money supply and liquidity and increase the inflation risk, not reduce it. To increase rates would go against the strategy of G7, to which we are committed.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) said that he agreed with the comments of the Governor of the Bank of England. I do not agree with them, and I did not understand the reference to the need to raise interest rates. That would be wrong and inconsistent with the earlier point that I made about maintaining a tight position in this country. Raising interest rates is an absurd response to the need to maintain the position, avoid debt and tighten credit.

The more realistic policy that my right hon. Friend may have to face is to return to more direct controls over consumer credit, the various ways in which plastic money is dished out and the way in which some credit companies freely provide credit to completely uncreditworthy people without bothering to find out how much they have already borrowed. He may have to consider, dare I say, direct hire purchase controls, which is an old instrument of the past. If we are concerned about avoiding consumer debt, that is where we must press the button. The idea that raising base rates will do anything to improve matters has been disproved; on the contrary, it would be counter-productive.

That is the message that I want to add to the interesting points that my hon. Friends have made. We must avoid debt and keep a tight ship. This is the very last moment when one should crowd on sail in the middle of a storm — that would be absurd. There are enormous squalls ahead and we must be extremely cautious. The vast inflation of assets and house prices led to the crash in October and it could lead to another. Inevitably and unavoidably, now will come the recession. That is now much the greater danger than price inflation, although we may get both at the same time. Price inflation will remain subdued because commodity prices will not rise—they will fall. Oil prices will fall and that will create a climate internationally of disinflation.

What we must be prepared for is recession. My right hon. Friend has helped to prepare us with great skill in moving through all these shoals and difficulties, but there is more to come and much more skill will continue to be needed if we are to get through without great hurt.

8.26 pm

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): I welcome the opportunity to speak in the debate, particularly as I am a member of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee that has considered the Autumn Statement and through it the state of the British economy.

Like my hon. Friends, I feel that the position is not quite as the Chancellor depicted it this afternoon. There are large sectors of weakness in our economy and in the Chancellor's strategy for dealing with it that have been glossed over.

One of our main concerns, if not the main concern, must be unemployment. I welcome any fall in unemployment, but even on the Government's figures it is still well over 2·5 million. I fail to understand how there can be general rejoicing among Conservative Members about the state of the economy when that level of unemployment persists. Rejoicing can begin only when unemployment drops below the level that it was when the Government took office in 1979.

In his evidence to the Select Committee, the Chancellor was less than clear about the future level of unemployment. He was not sure whether it would go up or down or stay the same, and he seemed to adopt a nonchalant attitude to questions.

Unemployment should be the centre of any economic strategy. I share the worries that many of my hon. Friends have stressed about the balance of payments, particularly about the value of manufactured goods and the increasing demand for imports. Allied to that is the fear that some have expressed, that many imports are bought on credit. As a part of the tremendous growth of consumer credit, that has virtually doubled since 1980. Perhaps even more worrying is the fact that the claims of moneylenders in court to recover loans has increased since 1980 by 180 per cent., which makes the credit problem clear.

As we look ahead to the Budget and the possible taxation changes, it is important to stress our commitment to zero rating on VAT. During Treasury questions today, the Government seemed to reiterate their commitment to continue with the zero rate on food, children's clothing and fuel, but we have still not had a firm commitment, despite repeated questioning during Question Time and in the Treasury Select Committee, to a continued zero rate on books, newspapers and periodicals. Perhaps in his reply the Chief Secretary will give such a commitment from the Government. I certainly hope so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) talked about the unfairness of much of the tax burden, and I echo what he said. The tax burden is distributed unfairly. I hope that the Government have studied the Government publication "Social Trends", which shows clearly that under this Government inequalities in society and disparities in incomes have greatly widened. I hope that the Chancellor will take those figures on board when looking at future tax reform. Many tax perks and concessions are given unfairly to those who are already well off.

One case which the Chancellor could pledge to do something about concerns tax perks and concessions for private investors in forestry. I understand that those concessions amount to about £10 million a year. That may not seem a great amount, but £10 million could build about three new hospitals. It could certainly extend the attendance allowance to children under the age of two, as suggested in the amendment to the social servic legislation put forward yesterday, which would cost on £7 million. It is unjust to give tax perks and concessio of that type.

A great deal of unfavourable publicity has been giv to generous tax concessions to well-known television ch show hosts and snooker players, who have created va tracts of unattractive conifer plantations which, in t absence of planning controls, are disfiguring some of o most beautiful landscapes and national parks. T Northumberland national park is having its charact changed daily by geometric slabs of monochrome conife The Chancellor could do his bit for nature conservatio and at the same time get back some money for a mo useful purpose by ending those concessions.

The concessions mean that, to meet the real cost of £4 per acre for conifers, the tax investor needs to fork o only £120. By careful switching from schedule A schedule B tax, the tax concessions become even mo generous. This form of forestry is uneconomic witho such concessions; I would ask the Government to affir that. The Government are paying ten times more subsidise forestry than to subsidise sheep farming on th same land. I hope that the Government will take this o board and give a commitment to us in the reply.

The initial points I made are more fundamenta particularly on unemployment. It would be good to hav a comprehensive strategy for tackling that subject tonigh although precedent suggests that this is very much i doubt.

8.34 pm

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): The Autum Statement is a vindication of the Government's economi policies since 1979. My right hon. Friend the Chancello and his predecessor deserve the country's gratitude for th way they have managed our economy. We have ha almost seven years of sustained growth. This yea manufacturing output will rise by 5 per cent., which is on of the highest rises in the industrial world.

Despite what the hon. Member for Gateshead, Eas (Ms. Quin) has said, unemployment has dropped b 500,000 and is falling rapidly. In the Bridlington an Driffield travel-to-work area in the north of Englan unemployment has fallen by 2 per cent. in the past yea and is now only 1 per cent. above the national average. A the same time, industrial productivity and profitabilit have grown fast. This has all been achieved at a time whe inflation has been progressively brought down.

The Chancellor now has a real chance to create virtuous economic circle. More growth creates highe profits and wages, which boost Government revenue. A Budget time the Chancellor will be in an enviable positio enjoyed by very few previous Chancellors. He will be abl to increase spending on health and education, as has bee announced in the statement, to reduce Governmen borrowing and taxation, and have a virtual balanced Budget for the first time in many years. That will stimulat non-inflationary growth even further.

As a result of the undoubted strength of our economy we are well placed to cope with the stock market crash which has taken place in most of the world's stock markets, and with the resulting world depression that i being forecast by many people, including many hon. Members, and most of our competitors. There is no doub that if there is a world recession we will be affected. Two aspects of the economy must be watched carefully. The first is the competitive position of industry, which is likely to be adversely affected by the recent strengthening of sterling. We should be reluctant to increase interest rates further, as that would push the value of the pound even higher. I suggest that at Budget time there is a good case—I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell)—for tightening the fiscal stance and allowing interest rates to fall and sterling to stabilise at a slightly lower level.

It would be damaging to our competitive position if unit labour costs rose faster than those of our industrial competitors. For several years, wages have risen significantly faster than inflation, but unit labour costs have been kept down by a massive increase in productivity. The rate of increase, which by historical standards has been large, is unlikely to be sustainable over many years. Recent increases of wages by 7 to 8 per cent. are worrying. Despite the pressure from many sources, the public sector, as the largest employer in the land, has a responsibility to set an example in keeping wage increases under control in 1988.

I have some apprehension about the level of public spending. Since 1979 the Government's policy on public spending has been progessively watered down. The Treasury Select Committee, on which I am privileged to serve, has drawn attention in previous reports to the policy changes, and that is repeated in paragraphs 13 and 14 of the report on the Autumn Statement. I was one of those who strongly supported the 1979 policy of reducing spending in real terms. I was unhappy that this was not achieved and that spending rose by 2·25 per cent. in real terms between 1978-79 and 1982-83. The Government then faced the facts and changed their objective to holding public spending broadly level in real terms, but regretfully they failed to achieve that objective.

The policy now is to let spending rise in real terms—it rose by 1·75 per cent. from 1982-83 to 1986-87—so long as it falls as a percentage of GDP. I was perturbed when the Chancellor informed the Committee at one of its recent meetings that in a recession the Government might let spending rise as a percentage of GDP in any particular year. Government spending, excluding the proceeds of privatisation, which is planned to be 42 per cent. of GDP in 1988-89, is far too high. We should have a target to get that figure down to under 40 per cent.

Without doubt the taxation rate on individuals is still too high. Our top rate of 60 per cent. is far too high when compared with our major industrial competitors. The bottom rate of 27 per cent., on to which is added 9 per cent. national health insurance contribution, making a total starting rate of 36 per cent., is also far too high.

Dr. Marek: The hon. Gentleman must get his facts right. Our top rate is not all that high. Only the United States and possibly one other country have a top rate lower than ours.

Mr. Townend: If the hon. Gentleman examines the facts, he will find that in many other countries the top rate starts at a much higher level of income.

Despite the excellent efforts by the Treasury in particular and the Government in general, expenditure in some areas is not very well controlled. The DHSS budget is spending £69 billion a year. I asked in a written question what was the cost to the United Kingdom taxpayer of DHSS payments to citizens of the Irish Republic. I received the reply that the Department did not know, as no separate records are kept. I thought that that might be understandable; perhaps all non-United Kingdom citizens were lumped together under one heading. Accordingly, I put down another question asking the total cost to the Exchequer of DHSS payments to non-United Kingdom citizens. I received the same reply—the Department had not the slightest idea.

I am sure that we are not receiving value for money in many parts of the Health Service. We have been pouring in billions of pounds of extra money every year, yet the demand for more resources by those with vested interests is rising like a crescendo. I find it strange that we have far more nurses per hospital bed occupied than have, for instance, Germany and France.

Such massive consumer resources should be split up. They are far too large for any single Cabinet Minister to oversee. There should be separate Cabinet Ministers for health and for social security. If we do not want an extra Cabinet Minister, social security should be tacked on to employment. That would be far more logical.

Let me say a brief word about the world scene. If the United States must solve its dual problems of the trade and the federal deficits, it will inevitably cease for a period to be the engine of the world economy. If we are to avoid a world recession, other countries will have to take its place.

The United Kingdom, with its growth rate in the past year, has certainly played its part—especially in view of its balance of payments deficit, which Opposition Members have pointed out. The world, however, must look to the two major surplus countries to play their part if we are to avoid recession. They, of course, are Germany and Japan. Although both countries make gestures by stimulating their economies, they have not done enough to keep world trade growing at the required rate. In particular, Japan's actions to open up its home markets to imports have been pitiful. Japan needs to be pressurised more effectively and, indeed, threatened with retaliation by all members of the G7 group.

It is interesting that our Foreign Secretary said on returning from Japan that he was hopeful that the discrimination against Scotch whisky would end—not now, but within a year. It is always the same with the Japanese: they will do it, but not now. It is not convenient; it is not politically possible; it is in the future. It is always the same old story.

I support the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) about intervention. It is very dangerous for us to intervene to keep up the value of the dollar when the United States is not putting its own money at risk. Table 4 on page 12 of the Select Committee report shows that the brunt of the intervention has been borne by Japan, Taiwan, the United Kingdom and Germany, not by America.

This is a year in which the Chancellor has the resources to make significant reductions and, I hope, significant reforms in taxation, and to stimulate enterprise even further. However, all the big spenders have the scent of money in their nostrils, and every pressure group imaginable is demanding more and more spending. The Chancellor should not give in to those strident demands. He should use the resources available to lower borrowing, and to reduce interest rates and taxes. Our economy is in a healthy state, and the hand on the tiller is perhaps the most able of this century. There may be economic storms ahead for the whole world, but we can be hopeful that Britain will come through relatively unharmed.

8.45 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): A few years ago, a bright young financial journalist wrote:

"In my mind the great social justification for a mildly inflationary economy is that a society in which borrowers do better than lenders of money is fundamentally more attractive than one in which the reverse is true."

I have often wondered what happened to the ideas and ideals of that young journalist—particularly now that he occupies No. 11 Downing street. One of three cardinal errors in the Government's approach to the economy has been consistently to create an economic environment that has favoured the lenders rather than the borrowers of money. This culminated in 1986, when real interest rates over the average for the year—taking the three-month Treasury rate compared with inflation—reached plus 7 per cent., one of the highest rates of the century.

The Government claim consistency for their economic policies. Certainly interest rates, at least, have been consistently high, but the reasons for that have been changing all the time. When the Government first came to office, there were high interest rates in hot pursuit of sterling M3. That was eventually given up as being unmeasurable. Some three years ago, the Chancellor hiked interest rates to stabilise the currency, and latterly we have had high interest rates to stop so-called "overheating" in the United Kingdom economy. The phrase "overheating" comes as a bitter irony to regions whose economy is still in deep freeze. Industrial production in Scotland, for example, has not even returned to the levels of 1980. How, then, are we to reflect on a Government who talk about high interest rates to stop overheating of the economy?

Conservative Members used to say—perhaps they still do—that there was a direct relationship between the level of interest rates and that of public borrowing: the higher the level of public borrowing, the higher that of interest rates. Among the many "achievements" of the present Chancellor has been to establish that, in the United Kingdom over the past eight years, there has been an inverse relationship between the level of public borrowing and that of interest rates. Over the period between 1979 and 1986, the public sector borrowing rate went from £10 billion to £3·5 billion. Over the same period real interest rates rose from minus 1 per cent. to plus 7 per cent. Under the Government, the lower the level of the PSBR, the higher the level of real interest rates.

What has it taken to get any amount off the real level of interest rates? It has taken a 25 per cent. stock market crash. I was talking the other day to one of my constituents, a hard-pressed farmer, who asked why there was at last some relief in the level of interest rates. I replied that the reason was a 25 per cent. stock market crash. He replied that he wanted a fall of another 25 per cent. so that he would secure another 2 per cent. off the interest on his borrowing.

That reflects real feeling in the real economy—the manufacturing and the producing economy—that its interests are being made subservient to those of the financial economy. Instead of growing with the manufacturing economy, the financial economy has grown at its expense. In the 10 years between 1976 and 198 financial sector increased its share of gross dor product from 11 per cent. to 16 per cent. In the period, the manufacturing sector declined from 2 cent. to 24 per cent. The financial sector has been all to grow at the expense of the real economy. Government have committed the error warned of previous Tory Chancellor of making industry too and finance too proud.

In later life Churchill conceded that he was prol the worst Chancellor in British history. To be fair t great man, he wrote that before the term of office c right hon. and learned Member for Surrey, East (S Howe). That right hon. and learned Gentleman ha distinction of wasting the greatest economic opport of modern times—more than £100 billion of oil rev protection for the United Kingdom's balance of paym For generations successive Governments have "blown off course" because of pressure on the balan payments. The Government came to office with constraint, but what did they do? They invented their constraint and introduced the sterling M3 target.

I was interested in the remarks made by the right and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brit who demonstrates that the spirit of 1979 to 1981 haunts the Conservative Back Benches. However, ho earth can he talk about regenerating the regional econ of the United Kingdom when he simultaneously advo a policy of fiscal retrenchment?

I regard the appropriation of Scottish oil revenu probably the greatest piece of international larceny the Spanish stole the Inca gold. However, such a would have been much easier to bear if the oil reve had been used to finance expansion and investment i economy instead of being used to finance monet experimentation and retrenchment, and if Scotland not been forced to bank-roll the Government's econ policies for the past eight years. Despite that, Chancellor still has the effrontery to come to Scotland tell the people how dependent we are on the largesse o Treasury!

The monetarist experiment is now over, but economic consequences live on. They live on with th emergence of the balance of payments as the n restraint in the United Kingdom economy. In the Aut Statement discussed today we have had the forecast £3·5 billion balance of payments deficit this year and is the possibility of it increasing next year to £5 billio £6 billion. The United Kingdom will have to pay its through the world without the comfort of massiv revenues and with a vastly reduced industrial base.

The third major failing in the Government's appro to the economy is their lack of any attempt to redres serious regional imbalances in the United Kingd Perhaps the greatest single cause of inflationary pres within the United Kingdom economy at the mome spatial imbalance. The south-east the south-west and Anglia are bidding up prices throughout the cou Government policy, far from redressing that balanc many ways reinforces it.

Let us consider the fiscal and transport subsidies are available to the south-east of England, Lon weighting, and the massive defence expenditure b along the M4 corridor. Such subsidies, together mortgage tax relief, represent massive implicit subs for the most privileged corners of the United Kingd

The south-east of England houses 30 per cent. of the United Kingdom population, but it obtains 50 per cent. of the available mortgage tax relief. That represents an excess subsidy over that region's population share of £1 billion. That should be compared with the regional aid budget for the whole of the United Kingdom. We find that mortgage tax subsidy—an excess subsidy for the south-east of England—is now worth more than the entire regional aid budget for the rest of the United Kingdom, and that is before taking into consideration the recent announcement on regional aid.

It is part of the hypocrisy of the present Administration that public expenditure in the regions and nations of the United Kingdom is described as an unacceptable subsidy, but massive tax subsidies for the south-east of England are said to be "fostering the enterprise economy".

The Government have critically weakened the United Kingdom's industrial base as a result of high interest rate and high exchange rate policies. Secondly, the vast opportunities of the oil revenues have been wasted. Thirdly, and perhaps most important, no attempt has been made to redress the maldistribution of resources. The Government have concentrated power, income and wealth in the south-east corner of the United Kingdom, which just happens to be occupied by the Conservative party's friends, sponsors and voters.

8.54 pm

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): I shall be brief, not least because I am an enthusiastic co-sponsor of the early-day motion proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) that urges that Back-Bench speeches should be limited to 10 minutes.

I wish to make three points. First, this year's Autumn Statement has been delivered against a background of profound international turbulence and nervousness in the financial markets. For many years, we were used to the British economy being rather less certain, more turbulent and less successful than other Western, or indeed Eastern, developed economies. Now the position has been reversed. In many ways, our economy is performing in much the same way as it did in the 1950s—inflation perhaps a little lower here and growth perhaps a trifle higher there. However, in the 1950s we were performing much worse than our main competitors—now we are performing rather better.

There must be something refreshing and perhaps invigorating for my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench about the way in which their policies and views have been copied around the world. That has occurred not only in countries with Administrations that follow avowedly free-market policies. So-called Socialist Governments in Scandinavia, Spain, Australia and New Zealand are pursuing policies similar to our own. That can hardly be dismissed as coincidence. In New Zealand and Australia, there has been a conversion to policies traditionally denoted as Thatcherite—a conversion to policies of minimum tax interference in the workings of the market and a philosophy of tax neutrality. It is interesting to note that the Labour Governments of those countries were returned to power in the past year—re-elected on such economic policies.

Over recent years, we have seen the internationalisation of the markets in terms of competition, supply side and tax regimes. Those countries that bucked that trend—as France did for a while—are now safely back on board. The alternative is simply too unpalatable. The countries that are winning are those which have competitive supply-side economies, which have competitive tax regimes and labour markets that work, and which are privatising and deregulating.

It is a truism that such greater internationalisation makes international co-operation vital. I believe that the concerted action behind the Louvre accord is absolutely essential. The accord has nothing to do with stopping international trends. It is not about seeking to prevent long-term market adjustments. It is about ensuring that the least amount of concerted intervention has the maximum impact on limiting the gyrations of the currency markets. Without such intervention, our industries and economies are too much at the mercy of the currency speculators.

My second point is that we are now in a strong position because of the consistency and sense of purpose of the policies that we have followed for the past eight years. Those eight years of caution and prudence have paid off. We have finally got public expenditure under control. We should keep growth in public spending within the prospective growth of the economy. The worst message that we could now give is that we have money to burn.

The corporate reforms enshrined in the 1984 Budget have had a dramatic effect. Corporate profits are now at an all-time high, with all the consequent gains for investment and new employment. I now look forward to a Budget that will include the major personal tax reforms that would be most beneficial to the supply side of the economy.

My third and final point is that I have some sympathy with paragraph 19 of the Select Committee report that deals with the determination of public expenditure priorities centrally, and particularly in respect of the NHS. The report makes the point that NHS expenditure has massively increased. Through medical research and discovery and the opening up of marvellous new medical cures and treatments, the demands and the need for funding medical care are increasing and will continue to increase. How we bridge that gap and how we increase the amount that we spend as a country on health care is a matter which exercises all hon. Members on both sides of the House. It is not a matter which I propose to pursue now.

However, the manner in which we target additional funds to the NHS is relevant to the debate. An overrun budget in a hospital department or a growing waiting list are not necessarily evidence only of need. They may be evidence of gross inefficiency and the misuse of resources. For example, we know that some hospitals spend three times as much as their neighbours on the same operation. We need to know much more about that phenomenon within the NHS if we are to ensure that increases in funding are to reach directly and effectively those in need. To achieve that aim we must develop the internal market within the NHS. That is the best way to ensure value for money, support better health practice and enable funds to stretch further in the interests of patients.

The Autumn Statement offers steadily rising living standards, rising employment, low inflation and impressive growth. It was presented to the House against the background of an increasing international consensus of Governments of both the Left and the Right on the rectitude and success of this Government's policies.

[Mr. Andrew Mitchell]

Tonight we shall see whether Opposition Members are moving towards accepting that consensus, or whether they wish to buck the trend and remain out in the cold.

9 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I want to emphasise how much the Chancellor has done during recent months to kill the goose that laid his golden eggs through a series of actions which have been directly harmful to British manufacturing industry.

The first and most dangerous of those actions was to encourage the pound to rise in value. The system of putting the pound into a relationship with the deutschmark when the deutschmark has to go up means that the pound has been rising and becoming dangerously uncompetitive. There has been a major loss in competitiveness during the past few months. A major real over-valuation compared with 1986 has emerged.

That tendency has been further sustained by the high interest rate, which the Chancellor refuses to reduce. Indeed, the Bank of England does not want to reduce it because it considers that the Chancellor has allowed credit to expand so enormously that any reduction in interest rates will boost the credit bubble again. Therefore, we are trapped in a policy of high interest rates and an over-valued pound, when it is logical that the pound should fall with the dollar, if we are to maintain our competitiveness in the American market which has produced two thirds of manufacturing exports since 1979. We have become dependent upon the American market. The dollar still has some way to fall. It is no use the world trying to shore up the dollar. We cannot push water uphill by international agreement. The pound needs to come down with the dollar.

The terms of trade in manufactures are now, at 104, worse than they were at the height of the monetarist depression in 1981. That forebodes the same consequences for manufacturing industry — the loss of jobs and exports and the rise of imports—as resulted from that depression. It means that expansion must now come to an end. We are now at an interesting turning point which will prove either the monetarist, moralist philosophy of economics that we have heard so much about from Conservative Members or the argument that I emphasise, that competitiveness and industrial health are based on the exchange rate, and that we need a competitive exchange rate for a healthy, exporting, competing manufacturing industry.

If the exchange rate hypothesis is correct, the economic consequences of the next few months will be serious to British industry. If the monetarist, moralist interpretation —to which several Conservative Members have referred —is correct, we shall be able to ride it out with only a slight setback in growth. We are now at that interesting test point. It is my thesis that the Chancellor needs to provide for some of the problems that we will have with our exports by expanding the domestic economy much more than he seems to envisage with the present half-cocked expansion, which is doing nothing to make up the ground we have lost or to bring down unemployment.

As a country, we are under-borrowed compared with competing economies and compared with what we need to do to sustain economic activities. If the exchange rate thesis is correct, it is ludicrous to cut borrowing, and even more ludicrous to be over-funding to try to d the credit explosion, which is what the Gove doing.

I conclude by saying that the next few m provide a serious test, which bodes ill manufacturing. With the over-valued pound, t trade and the high interest rate burdens with compelled to compete, the prospects for manufacturing and for a continued fall in une are dire indeed.

9.4 pm

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Th an interesting and informative debate in whic had a maiden speech by the hon. Member for (Dr. Goodson-Wickes). He concentrated, ap for his position as a doctor, on many of the is the Health Service. His speech was eloquent an in its delivery, even if it concentrated on the si of the Health Service at the expense of the dark the horizon.

The debate was also dignified by speeches Chairmen of the Select Committee on Treasur Service and the Public Accounts Committee. has been graced too by speeches from my Friends the Members for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and fro Friends the Members for Durham, North (M Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) and Great Grim Mitchell).

The debate may be remembered most for the speech by the right hon. Member for Shropsh (Mr. Biffen) who suggested that the 1p or 2p otherwise have gone to tax cuts would be bette the National Health Service, the amount being if reckoned at 2p. He has done more in a few speak up for the traditions of one-nation Toryis Chancellor has done in eight long years as a mem Conservative Government.

When we face one of the biggest crises in th Health Service in its 40-year history, when we st million unemployed and 5 million on supp benefit, and when 8 million are dependent on the and 16 million are on low incomes, one m thought that the Chancellor would at least ha this afternoon to consider some of the tasks th undone. One would have thought that congratulation might have been interrupted to of the poverty, deprivation and misery in our that we might have heard from the Chancello promise or a commitment, at least the offer t using some of our national resources to relieve further to reduce unemployment and to help the Health Service, which is in such need.

But the truth about the Government has been as my right hon. and hon. Friends have said so e Even though the Government have the money windfall of North sea oil revenue being hi expected, money available to them by good fort than by good management — even though been made aware from both sides of the Hou needs of the people, even though to secure re-ele made certain promises and even though they c themselves the employment benefits of spen investing the money, the Government refuse enough on Britain. Money that was once wi grounds of financial prudence is now withheld for reasons that can only be described as ideological. Again and again in the last eight years the Government have said that they would spend if they could. Now they can, and they will not.

If the economy is as successful as the Chancellor has said, why cannot he spend sufficient money to provide a decent level of pensions for 9 million pensioners? Why has he had to freeze child benefit for the 7 million mothers and 12 million children who depend on it, and why for the first time in 40 years has he had to introduce charges for a visit to the optician and dentist to raise £170 million?

If the economy is fundamentally far stronger than it has ever been, as the Chancellor said at the new year, and if we are to look forward to long-term sustainable, secure growth and rises in living standards, why by the one test of these economic prospects—the level of investment in training, in education, in research and development, and in machinery and plant—have the Government done worse and why are they still doing worse than all our major competitors? Why as a result of the Autumn Statement will the Government continue to do worse in the next three years?

Why are we investing less in ourselves—as a share of our national income—than all our major competitors, including Japan, which appears to be investing 50 per cent. more than we are? Why is no other country in the industrialised world, with the exception of Belgium, investing less in its economy? Why are we investing less as a share of our gross national product in the oil-rich 1980s than we did in the 1960s and the 1970s?

If the Chancellor will not listen to me, will he listen to the Confederation of British Industry, which had this to say a few weeks ago about our growth rate:

"The momentum will not be sustained without much higher levels of investment in research, development and training, as well as fixed capital."

And, if he will not listen to the CBI, will he not listen to the Engineering Employers Federation, which said in its Budget submission:

"We believe the level of investment expenditure in the UK to have become disturbingly low . . . What concerns us is that growth will be unsustainable without increased investment, training and research and development."

Faced with that record of low investment generally, might we not have expected the Chancellor to be telling us in his Autumn Statement how he is to bridge that gap in all those major areas, how he is going to make up that investment shortfall, especially when we know that in the public sector we invest 40 per cent. less per head than is invested in Germany and 200 per cent. less than is invested in Japan?

Is it not the case—and I expect detailed answers from the Chief Secretary when he replies this evening—that, far from narrowing, that gap will widen as a result of the Autumn Statement: £100 million a year less in local authority direct investment each year until 1990; £800 million a year less in public sector capital investment each year until 1990; a 2, 3, 4 per cent. decline in the amount of money invested by the Government in our economy? No wonder the CBI has also said that "the cuts in public sector capital spending must be reversed."

The Government's argument throughout all this is that spending has been sufficient, even when all the evidence from doctors, teachers, industrialists and public servants has been the opposite. If the Chancellor believes that spending is sufficient, has he looked at the state of our schools? One million of our primary schoolchildren a being educated in classrooms built before the first wor war, on which, as a result of the Autumn Statement, on 2 per cent. of the money needed for vital repairs is to spent. Has he visited our hospitals, where two thirds of t wards were built in the days of the voluntary and chari hospitals and even now nurses are having to leave the patients to run flag days to raise money for vit equipment and repairs? Has he seen the condition of o inner cities and our regions? Has he looked at our roa and railways? Does he not understand that what we do n invest in infrastructure today we shall have to spend more unemployment tomorrow?

Nowhere is the need for greater investment more cle than in research and development, science and innovatio Prior to the last election the Government promised th they would spend more money in this area. They promise more support for single industry research. The commissioned and received the Bide report on informatio technology. They gave the impression that they woul sponsor further space research. They promised £20 million for the collaborative programme in electronic called LINK. But since the election there has been not penny more for single industry support, which is no abolished; not a penny more for space research, a further, we pull out of the European programme; not penny more for the second stage of Alvey, for which th demand was for £400 million and which is to receiv around £30 million; not a penny, after 13 months, for th LINK programme in electronics. Is it not a scandal that 13 months after the Prime Minister announced th creation of the LINK programme in electronics, not penny has been spent, especially when the Prime Ministe said as she announced it in December 1986 that it was "essential that advances were rapidly exploited"?

The Government claim that they are spending mor when they are spending less, as a Government, o industrial research and development. Perhaps that is wha the Department of Trade and Industry meant when i claimed recently in its press release that it was "helping to translate science fiction into fact".

All this has happened since the Prime Minister took personal responsibility for our research and scientific effort.

Education, promised more in the Autumn Statement and at the election, receives less after we take into account the election year teachers' salary commitments and redundancies in our universities. The vast majority of British young people leave school at the earliest opportunity without qualifications. Half as many workers in Britain have technical qualifications than their counterparts in the United States, Japan and West Germany. A lower proportion of our people are in higher education than in any European country with the exception of Portugal. If we followed the example of Japan, the United States and West Germany, 500,000 more pupils would stay on at school. One million more pupils would leave with higher grade qualifications and there would be 500,000 more people in our universities and colleges.

We are now doing worse than countries far smaller than ourselves. South Korea, with a population of 50 million, has 1,200,000 university and college students, yet Britain, with a bigger population, has only 800,000. Our best prospect now appears not to try to stay level with Japan, but to keep up with Taiwan, not to beat West Germany, but to stay up with South Korea. Are Conservative Members proud of the fact that, instead of pursuing the ambition to have the best educated, best trained, best qualified working population in the world, we are spending much less than most of our European competitors on education?

The cuts are nowhere more obvious and alarming than in the Government's policy towards our regions. The latest Government figures show that more than one million jobs have been lost since 1979 in the north, Scotland and Wales. The latest Government figures published in December show that the real value of manufacturing investment is still 35 per cent. lower in the north than it was in 1979, 33 per cent. lower in Yorkshire, 30 per cent. lower in the north-west and 27 per cent. lower in Wales. Most damaging of all is the high permanent unemployment, emigration and forced depopulation in one part of the country when we have overheating, congestion, skill shortages, pressure on the green belt and escalating house prices in another part of the country. That is neither good for the regions nor for the country as a whole.

What is the Government's reaction? On Tuesday they published a White Paper which makes a virtue of the fact that they will cut automatic regional aid which was worth £800 million in 1979, £200 million this year and will be worth nothing in the future. They plan to replace it with private consultancy services, one-stop shops and advisory services whose chief feature is that they will benefit the more prosperous regions more than they will ever benefit the disadvantaged regions. What has happened to the bipartisan tradition in regional policy? Regional policy was started by a Conservative Government when unemployment in the regions was 4 per cent. to 5 per cent. The Government are now abandoning it when unemployment is still about 14 per cent. to 15 per cent. in most of our industrial regions.

What about the promises to the inner cities? They are now in danger of moving from depression to recession, without ever having enjoyed an intervening period of recovery. Where is the new investment that will benefit the inner cities? Does the Minister not realise that the small amounts given by the Prime Minister to urban development corporations, city action forces and inner city task forces have already been taken away in cuts in rate support grant, and regional aid, and further cuts, even at the heart of the urban programme?

I do not know how Conservative Members can deny that. At the election the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry made a great virtue of the fact that the programme for the inner cities would have to be self-financing. The Chief Secretary said:

"We will not succeed by spending money".

The British economy was not to have performed like that. It was to be quite the reverse. I shall finish the quotation:

"We can only tackle the problems of the inner cities by direct action to encourage local initiative, by giving people the opportunity to be self-reliant."

Does closing schools in the inner cities provide the opportunity to be self-reliant? Does cutting the number of beds and wards in hospitals give patients the opportunity to be self-reliant?

Did the Government ever intend to do anything for the inner cities? We are told that on election night the Prime Minister said that something had to be done for the inner cities. But when it was suggested to the Pr when she visited the north-east a few month walkabout that she had said that something h for the inner cities, she said:

"That was not quite what we said."

Notice the royal "we".

"We said that we wanted to win back those our cause."

That was not a commitment to jobs in the in to votes in the inner cities. Success is to be j how much people in the inner cities were as how much the Tory party in the inner cities

Is that not the old trick — to hold ou possible by denying that there is a problem cities, the Health Service, or the educatio anywhere else, and then to turn out a huge a initiative more to do with public relations policy changes?

Is that not what happened to the ente announced with a great flurry in 1979 abandoned by the Government with a pre Christmas eve? Is that not what happened w new initiative for 20 city technology colleges October 1986 by the Secretary of State fo only four of which have been designated which has been opened?

What about all the other initiatives? Reme 2000 and Mr. Richard Branson of Virgin R Branson was brought in to clean up the litter. cleaned up; the litter remained — governn grand and great design, but government by government by gesture. We do not get job c our inner cities and regions, simply advertisin

As we gear the next election, the Prime return to the inner cities and, just as s unemployment, she will declare the proble deprivation to be solved, no doubt after 19 c definition of "inner city". When the Health Service needs at least an cent. above inflation, the Autumn Statement per cent. That is the best that the Autumn St do. We find ourselves with one quarter of the is needed. [Interruption.] The Chief Secretary will give the figures. The statisticians in the T now be at work. The figures are clear in t Statement. One should take account of th spending is to rise by £100 million this year, and if that is not compensated for next year by another announcement there will be a cut.

The Government used to tell us that they would spend if only they had the money. Now they have the money and they still refuse to spend. It is not a shortage of cash in the Treasury that is depriving the Health Service of resources; it is a shortage of compassion and concern on the part of the Government. It is not the absence of money; it is the absence of morality in the Government. If they do not accept what we say, let them look at the evidence around the country. I shall not take the most publicised versions of what has been going on in different areas and communities. All one needs to do is to listen to the health authorities, the doctors and the patients.

One has only to listen to the consultants in Birmingham who, on Monday, had to form a committee to save the Health Service; to listen to the Cornwall health authority, which yesterday had to close a 79-bed hospital to save £500,000; to listen to the Greater Manchester health authority, which says it cannot even pay its salary bills and whose cash is running out—any other authority in that position would have been declared bankrupt; to listen to the people from the midlands whom the Prime Minister refused to meet this afternoon; to listen to the Shropshire health authority, which is faced with a decision to close 10 hospitals with a loss of 367 beds; to listen to them all to know that waiting lists are at 850,000 throughout the whole of the United Kingdom, we have lost 46,000 beds since 1979, 30,000 nurses are leaving the Health Service every year, and if the Government do not spend the money that is required, the Health Service faces the rest of 1988 with a crisis on its hands.

The position of the Government and of the Prime Minister is that the private sector must be encouraged to bridge the gap, even when she knows that the National Health Service is more efficient, less administratively expensive to run and that, in a unique way, it combines economy with equity. Even though all those things are known, and the Prime Minister knows that the public want to spend money on health—and want it spent on the National Health Service—she refuses to invest any more. She would prefer private money being used ineffectively to public money being used productively. She believes in the private sector, not because it is more efficient—it is not—but because it is the private sector. She opposes the extension of public provision, not because she thinks it is inefficient, but merely because it is public. In that way, she would reduce our great National Health Service, which is internationally admired and the envy of the world, to the economics of her corner grocer shop and the morality of the worst ethics of the stock market. Thereby denying people the security of a national service and replacing it with the uncertainty of dependence on free market forces, she then parades that choice as an extension of freedom.

My right hon. and hon. Friends have said today that the Chancellor faces a choice. We are told that he is considering reducing the top rate of tax for the top 4 per cent. of the population, at a cost of £850 million. Why does he not spend that money properly on the National Health Service, education and the public services? We are told he is considering abolishing capital gains tax, which is paid by the top people in this country, raising just over £1 billion. We are told that he is considering abolishing inheritance tax, which raises £1 billion from those who are rich enough to inherit sums of more than £90,000. Is it clear to the Chancellor that the wish of the country of the vast majority of its people is that, instead of tax to make the rich few who will benefit from them richer, money should be spent on our Health Service, pu investment and the expansion of our public services?

No Government have had the advantages of North oil revenues of £60 billion of windfall money that Government have enjoyed. During these past eight ye no country has lost so many jobs in productive indust or has invested so little a share of its national incom its industry or public services, with the result that country faces the future so ill-prepared for the proble of the 1990s or the 21st century. If the Germans discovered oil, would they have closed down the Ruhr invested all the money abroad? Would the Japanese h closed down their computer industry and put all th money abroad?

The message to the Chancellor from the country clear. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Mem for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said earlier, Chancellor may have changed his tune about importance of the money supply and about the wisdom leaving interest rates and exchange rates to the vagaries free market forces, but on the issue of public investme especially investment in the National Health Service, has refused to learn from his mistakes. Even when he the money and knows the needs, even when the Pri Minister has made promises, and when we can see employment benefits of investing in the National Hea Service, in education and the industries of this country, Chancellor refuses to invest more in Britain. His i message of dogma and ideology. What this country nee is realism and common sense, and for that it will have look to the Labour party.

9.30 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Majo

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) h just made his debut as an Opposition Front Ben spokesman on the economy. He spoke with considera eloquence and passion, but what he said was a welter misleading and half-understood statistics, almost all which were wholly inaccurate.

The hon. Gentleman had much to say about jobs, b nothing to say about falling unemployment. If the ho Gentleman read the Autumn Statement, he clearly did n understand it. He refered to social security cuts, but ma no acknowledgement of the £48·5 billion that is ma available in the Autumn Statement. He referred education restraint, with no acknowledgement of the ext £630 million over last year's provision.

The hon. Gentleman referred to inner cities with acknowledgement of the fact that this year's publ expenditure plans will bring total urban spending to £5 million a year, which is two and a half times more in re terms than the amount spent by the Labour Governme at any time during their period of office. The ho Gentleman made no reference to the substantial growth initiatives that the Government have produced in rece years for the inner cities, such as urban developme corporations, urban development grants, urban regener tion grants, enterprise zones, the inner city initiative an Estate Action. None of those initiatives has reached th

[Mr. John Major]

hon. Gentleman. I do not know where he has been for the last few years, but I dare say that Rip Van Winkle is better informed than the hon. Gentleman about what is going on.

The hon. Gentleman referred to investment, but made no mention of the fact that in the economy as a whole investment was at record levels last year. Indeed, in the first three quarters of 1987 it was up 3·5 per cent. on the previous year's record figures. All those facts were overlooked by the hon. Gentleman in his welter of misleading statistics.

However, until the hon. Gentleman's speech we had had an interesting and thoughtful debate, which was marked by several excellent speeches, including an extremely eloquent maiden contribution from my hon. Friend the Member for Wimbledon (Dr. Goodson-Wickes). My hon. Friend paid a warm and generous tribute to his predecessor, Lord Havers. We all join my hon. Friend in wishing the noble Lord a full recovery soon from his recent illness.

My hon. Friend called for more publicity for payroll giving to charity. I congratulate him on turning his maiden speech towards a most important and interesting topic. I shall certainly draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend and I hope that those in industry and commerce who deal directly with payroll giving will take my hon. Friend's remarks to heart.

My hon. Friend has the triple attributes of being an occupational physician and barrister and a former serving officer in the Army. I have no doubt that the House will make ample use of his knowledge and talents in all of those areas, and will look forward to hearing from him on many occasions.

It is not often that events in the world economy take centre stage in British politics, but the effects in world markets and the responses of the major countries have justifiably and understandably raised serious questions in people's minds. It was, therefore, entirely appropriate that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor should have devoted so much of his opening speech to those issues.

While the fall in stock markets and the instability of the dollar have made the outlook more uncertain, this is clear to those who wish to see it. The British economy has the strength to weather any external difficulties that might arise. That strength is founded on the sound public finances that we have set out clearly in the Autumn Statement. The statement sets out our broad plans for public expenditure. The House may wish to know that the public expenditure White Paper, which will give our detailed plans, and better inform the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, will be published next Wednesday. I am sure that we will then have the opportunity to debate it in the normal way, once the Select Committee has concluded its consideration.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), who is at present enjoying a no doubt fascinating conversation with his hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), spread his net quite widely. I shall turn to his comments on the National Health Service in a few moments.

When the right hon. and learned Gentleman hinges his remarks on opinion polls, as he did, perhaps I may remind him of an opinion poll last June that left him in Opposition and the Government in power with a substantial majority. Before he starts lecturing the Governme polls and public attitudes, he might rem of the election just a few months ago.

It was generous of the right ho Gentleman to assume that my right Chancellor might have a fiscal adjustment Budget. That is not only generous, but before that June opinion poll the right Gentleman and his hon. Friends were the country to expect higher taxes and pu cuts.

I am gentler than my right hon. Friend so I will not quote the explicit words Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook [HON. MEMBERS: "Go on."] No, I am mu that. The fact is that the Opposition we public expenditure and they have chan about our tax prospects. If the Opposition and have changed their minds so rapidly I am not sure why they should assume th now in anything that they say.

Before I respond to the right ho Gentleman's remarks, I wish to deal with our public finances, as set out in the Aut Much of what has been said today reinfor the background to the debate is extrem Growth in manufacturing output contin there is a secure outlook for investment

My right hon. Friend promised tha specifically with public expenditure, and so. Our plans include cash increases in th of £2½ billion and £5½ billion in the next t of which is directed specifically to priority emphasise for the right hon. and learn interest that they are increases, not expenditure. Our plans also show a welcom in the share of national income tak expenditure, with the trend set to contin cent. of gross domestic product in 1986-87 by 1990-91. That will be of special pleas hon. and learned Friend the Member Yorks (Mr. Brittan), who expressed his c off inflationary pressures and urged cauti stance. I agree without qualification that caution are vital and I know that the Chan heard my right hon. and learned Friend' great interest.

Public borrowing this year is also down of gross domestic product — £1 billio noticeably better than earlier expectations for 18 years. This is in sharp contrast to e industrial world, where the ratio of Gove income has been rising. Here, as an act of bucked the trend, and our debt interest decreased from 5½ per cent. of GDP in 19 cent. this year. Lest that seem an arcane point out that the decline, which is set to c that within our medium-term plans we are more on priority programmes and less on

The 1 per cent. reduction in debt inter £4½ billion — precisely the sum by whi spending is increased before taking accoun hope that it is not too unkind to remind if borrowing had stayed at the same proport income that we inherited, the increased ser year would have been £8½ billion — nea standard rate of income tax. That is where increased borrowing would have got this Government and the taxpayer, and that statistic was noticeably missing from the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East.

Nor did the right hon. and learned Gentleman make any mention of his pre-election claims of higher taxes and lower public expenditure if the Government were re-elected. Nor, interestingly, in view of the way that he twitted my right hon. Friend the Chancellor about not covering all aspects of policy, was there any reference to the new economic strategy that the leader of the Labour party commissioned from the shadow team six months ago today. It may be that the future of other policies launched yesterday encouraged the right hon. and learned Gentleman to remain silent. In any event, Labour policies remain a secret after six months, while the alliance's have become a catastrophe after six hours.

The debate has repeatedly returned to public expenditure priorities, and the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), his right-hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East, my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) and a number of other right hon. and hon. Gentlemen referred specifically to the National Health Service. My right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North set out some intriguing principles for the reform of the National Health Service and I have no doubt that they will be widely read and considered, although they seemed to receive no endorsement from Opposition Members who still live in a time of many years ago.

Few people would doubt the genuine affection in which the National Health Service is held. It has been manifested in recent weeks in calls for greater funding and I will return to that point in a moment. First, I wish to refer to Opposition Members who in recent years have repeatedly claimed that the Government simply do not care about the National Health Service.

Miss Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): The Minister's performance is absolutely pathetic.

Mr. Major: Not only is this not true, but remarks like that simply trivialise and debase what ought to be an important national debate—and the hon. Member for Redcar (Miss Mowlam) illustrates the point far more eloquently than I can. I have no doubt that Opposition Members care about the National Health Service, and I have no doubt that their predecessors cared 10 years ago when they imposed on the Health Service the largest capital cuts it has faced at any time in its history. So the question is not about who cares—we all care—but about how to achieve the quality and quantity of service that we all wish to see. In that, money cannot be the whole answer. The pressures are clear.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) is present with us. Lord Wilson of Rievaulx once referred to the hon. Gentleman as the silliest man in the House. Clearly, that was one of the noble Lord's characteristic understatements.

The pressures on the NHS are clear. Demographic changes, an aging population, medical improvements and greater expectations have all led to the calls for greater funding. If we are genuinely concerned not about making political points but about getting the best possible Health Service, that cannot be the whole answer. [Interruption.] It is interesting that the Opposition are not ge interested in the Health Service but only in partisan political points about the Health Service.

The House is familiar with the growing re devoted to the service, the increasing number of p treated and the increasing number of medica employed. [Interruption.] I see that the hon. Mem Walsall, North is making his usual inte contribution; he is welcome.

Mr. Winnick: Does the Minister use the NHS?

Mr. Major: The answer to the hon. Gentl question is yes.

For next year, the net increase for the whole National Health Service is £1·15 billion and a increase is already committed in the public expe plans for the second year in the public expe programme. To that £1·15 billion must be add proceeds of cost improvements programmes, generation schemes and, to supplement programmes, the resources raised by surplus land

We are witnessing extensive public examination resources put into the Health Service and I believe need equally careful consideration of what we get the Health Service as a result of the money that we p it. Some of what we get is familiar and welcome: th medical staff responsible for patients, the extra 1 in-patient cases, the extra 500,000 day cases and th 3·75 million out-patient cases. Those improvements service are concrete evidence that the Governmen put in extra resources for care and that they ha used.

As the right hon. and learned Member for Monk East and my right hon. Friend the Member for Shro North acknowledged, Governments alone cannot m infinite demands for health care.

We have to ask some uncomfortable manag questions of the NHS if we are genuinely to confro difficulties of getting the best possible patient care resources that are made available. Why are surgical beds in some parts of the country empty for seven days between patients but occupied again than half a day in other parts of the country? question deserves an answer. Why does it cost m some hospitals than in others to do the same operati the same type of patient? Why can so few authorities tell us what a particular operation costs do general surgery patients spend two and a half d hospital before their operations in some health di while in others they spend less than a day? Why, there are said to be nursing shortages, do four overlaps on nursing shifts still exist? Those gen concerned to improve the quality of our health care b that those questions, as well as the question of reso need to be addressed.

Moreover, those questions need an answer before the Opposition can know that shortage of funds problem. If the answers are unsatisfactory, the ca looking first to improve value for money bec unanswerable.

Mr. Winnick: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Major: No, he will not.

That is why, when responding to the problems a this year, we insisted that the extra funds accompanied by an improvement in the arrangements for monitoring Health Service performance and why I believe that the results of that monitoring should be published in the interests of getting the best patient care.

Mr. John Smith: The Chief Secretary to the Treasury is aware that yesterday the heads of the three royal medical colleges met the Secretary of State for Social Services, who gave them certain assurances. Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether, in real terms, any extra money, on top of that committed in the Autumn Statement and in statements since, will be given to the National Health Service?

Mr. Major: The right hon. and learned Gentleman anticipated what I was about to say in a couple of paragraphs' time.

We all wish to ensure that patients are treated as well and as speedily as possible. If we are to do that we cannot and should not exclude medical practice and medical efficiency from consideration in the future. It is neither acceptable nor credible simply to blame the level of funding.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East referred to press comments following the meeting between the Secretary of State for Social Services and the presidents of the three royal colleges. I cannot answer for those press reports, but I can confirm that my right hon. Friend made it clear to the presidents that we had recognised the need to increase resources for health care in the public expenditure round that we have just concluded. Furthermore, last month we announced an additional £100 million for the National Health Service for the current year, and next year we plan to make available a record £21 billion, which is 32 per cent. more in real terms than under the last Labour Government.

We are launching the new income generation scheme and taking powers to increase health authority powers. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North said, we see the private sector as having an important role to play in the provision of health care. That is what my right hon. Friend made clear to the three presidents, and he did not suggest to them that further sums were about to be added to this year's public expenditure settlement.

The increase in public expenditure in real terms for the next year, in terms of the specific increase identifiable in the public expenditure White Paper, is around 2·1 per cent. With the income generation scheme and other schemes, that is likely, based on precedent, to be raised to a real-terms increase of about 3 per cent. in the next year, which is precisely the sum that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East said was needed. That is the sum that will be available in the next year for the public expenditure settlement that has just been concluded.

The Autumn Statement shows that the National Health Service has been a major beneficiary, with an increase of £700 million over plans in England. There have been other significant additions to the programmes that I have mentioned and other programmes as well.

Mr. Winnick: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Major: No.

The plans for education have been increased by £600 million, providing additional funding for universities, for basic science and for improving th buildings. There are additions fo particular to provide for an exp building programme that will an million in the next financial year.

We have also, contrary to w substantial additions to our cap capital spending will be about £22 billion more than we had previou increase, spending by nationalised about £660 million, and spending particularly on housing, another £

Mr. Winnick: That is all he is goi

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Me across the Chamber.

Mr. Major: It is clear that the legacy of the noble Lord has upset the hon. Gentleman.

I know that my right hon. Friend and the Select Committee are uneasy that Departments are expected to look first to their own cash provisions to finance new initiatives. I make no apology for asking a Minister seeking additional resources to see what in the first instance he can contribute from his own programme to offset the savings. If savings cannot be found, his bid will have to be considered alongside those from other Departments and against the possibility of making reductions in existing programmes. To allow Departments to post off bids to the Treasury without having searched for offsetting savings would substantially weaken public expenditure control, and I have no intention of permitting that to happen.

We have heard a little today about cuts, but not as much as we often do. The dog has barked less loudly than usual. It may be that the Opposition are beginning to realise that it is possible to increase spending, reduce borrowing and cut taxes if we pursue policies that lead to an expanding economy. I remind the Opposition what real cuts look like: a 30 per cent. reduction in capital spending on hospitals and a 40 per cent. reduction in roads capital spending — the product not of this public expenditure survey but of those conducted by Lord Barnett.

Let me tell the Opposition what Tory "cuts" look like: a 36 per cent. increase in National Health Service capital spending, a 30 per cent. increase in the roads programme, and further increases in the coming years. Our cuts have been in borrowing and inflation, not in hospitals and roads. The cuts we have seen have been cuts by the Labour party in Labour headquarters in Walworth road and in the axing of that most enjoyable publication "Labour Weekly" only weeks after reporting that Labour lost the election on economic issues. "Labour Briefing" also has little affection for the Labour party, as it clearly shows.

The Autumn Statement reflects the greatly improving prospects for the economy. Public spending and borrowing are under control. Inflation is low and will remain so, investment is rising, unemployment is falling and there will be growth this year and next year. The Autumn Statement is a further signpost on the route to prosperity, and I commend it to the House.

[Mr. Jones]

Compensation Board on a statutory footing. My hon. Friends and I welcome the further strengthening of the compensation provisions, because this is an important element of sentencing and should be used far more effectively by the courts. It is distressing that prosecuting counsel, solicitors and magistrates are often reluctant to use the powers and to inform victims and injured parties of their rights. Very often they are advised, even in circumstances where a compensation order could be made, to pursue the matter through the civil courts, which leads to greater distress, expense and delay. I would like to see more use made of compensation orders and to see the Bill strengthened in this regard.

One of the most contentious parts of the Bill is the abolition of the right of peremptory challenges of jurors. Many hon. Members have expressed their disagreement to the abolition of this basic and fundamental right. I ask myself: if the right has existed and served the legal system for so many years, why should it now be right to abolish it? A defendant might be prejudiced by having to show cause, yet a defendant has the right to have a jury which is representative of the community in terms of the race, age or sex of the defendant, and that right should continue.

During my intervention I sought to make the point that a recent survey showed that where the right of peremptory challenge had been used, 46 per cent. of defendants were acquitted, and where it had not been used 45 per cent. of defendants had been acquitted, so it does not seem, as Conservative Members have argued, that the right favours the defendants, because it does not have that effect. Not only must justice be done, it must be seen to be done. Defendants, having been given the right, should be entitled to think that their trial is fair.

I have tried to deal briefly with many issues in the Bill. I hope that in Committee we shall have the opportunity further to strengthen the Bill and to withdraw some of the contentious issues. I hope that at the end of the day the Minister, having listened to the many contributions, will reconsider some of the most controversial aspects of the Bill.

8.24 pm

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise some points on the Bill. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister and my hon. Friends in the Home Office for producing a forward-looking and progressive Bill. I will not detain the House by discussing its many clauses. Prior to the last election, I was a member of the Standing Committee on the Criminal Justice Bill 1987, on which this Bill is based, and voted in favour of many clauses.

I welcome some of the new clauses, particularly those on possession of knives and offensive weapons, which are very necessary. There is good evidence from a study carried out in Scotland of the need for some form of stop-and-search legislation, particularly allied to knives, which will be a major preventive measure and will make our streets safer.

In the previous Bill, the clauses on child abuse provided that children could give evidence by video link. Those of us who have been involved in cases where children have been the victims of crime are well aware that young children find it traumatic to give evidence in open court, particularly on crimes of violence or sexual crimes, when they have difficulty repeating the details of the incident. It is important to do everything we can to soften the trauma of that experience, and the Bill is a move towards that.

The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) commented on the taking of videos of children, and perhaps the Government will consider that that could be a positive move. The video could be taken immediately after the complaint is made, so that the jury will be able to see how the complaint was made and the effect of the crime upon the child. The normal course of cross-examination could follow.

Mr. John Patten: Does not my hon. Friend, who is an expert in these matters, feel that a recording taken essentially for investigative reasons by the police, but perhaps also for therapeutic reasons by medical authorities, is a different animal from the evidence that a court should have in front of it? In addition, it would not spare the child, quite rightly, from cross-examination.

Mr. Hind: I take my hon. Friend's point; it would be wrong if the child were not cross-examined. Any suggestion that a video of the evidence should be taken and presented to the court without being tested would be wholly wrong, and I certainly would not support any move in that direction. Whatever happens, the defendant's counsel must have the right to test the evidence.

I support the move to allow a child to give unsworn evidence which could result in a conviction, because in many cases of abuse the child is the only witness and is not capable of giving sworn evidence, so the removal of the need for corroboration would open the door to examine and convict people who commit these most horrible offences. However, I press Ministers to ensure that the judge makes it clear to the jury that there are dangers in convicting on uncorroborated evidence. I hope that that will be part of their thinking when these matters are debated in Committee.

The Opposition's third criticism involves the increase to a life sentence of the penalty for carrying a firearm during a crime. I accept some of the criticisms, but one must not underestimate the deterrent effect, particularly on young unsophisticated criminals, of realising that if they take a firearm to commit an offence, their punishment will be life imprisonment. They will know that, because of the way in which our sentencing system operates, that will not be life imprisonment in the strict sense, but it will be a deterrent.

We must not undermine our deterrents with intellectual arguments which appeal to Members of Parliament, but do not appeal in the same way to those who will involve themselves in such offences. Having defended many young men who have gone into post offices with firearms, I am sure that if they had known that the likely outcome was a sentence of imprisonment, they would not have done it.

What we need in the Bill is a new sentencing manifesto and I hope that the Government will consider that in future. We have begun the process. I welcome the introduction of the right of appeal to the Court of Appeal through the auspices of the Attorney-General. Many of us in Committee on the previous Bill argued long and hard for that course of action and I am pleased that my hon. Friends have accepted our argument.

Mr. John Patten: We are a listening Government.

Mr. Hind: I take my hon. Friend's point that this is, indeed, a listening Government.

My one reservation about the proposal is the suggestion that the matter should go through the Attorney-General. I have always felt that the role of the Attorney-General is difficult. On the one hand, he is the Government's adviser and, on the other, he is the head of the prosecution service. The danger in his being head of the prosecution service and being answerable to Members of Parliament is that circumstances could arise in which hon. Members jump to their feet and say to the Attorney-General, "What will you do about the case of Snooks at Grimsby Crown court? He got only six months and he should have got two years." I am sure that some of us have certain hon. Members in mind and we do not want to bring that sort of question into the political arena. I press my hon. Friends to consider introducing a division between the judicial and executive functions of the Attorney-General. We should not put the two together.

The one way to deal with that is by giving the power either to the Crown prosecutor in each region or to the Director of Public Prosecutions. A code of practice could be laid down by the Court of Appeal by direction or by the Attorney-General. Everything would then operate within those guidelines and could be seen. In that way we would keep out everday criminal cases from the Chamber. There is a danger that individual criminal cases could become part of our daily deliberations, which many hon. Members would regard as retrogade and unnecessary.

The most important aspect of the sentencing provisions — this must not be forgotten when the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) talks about a crisis—is that the crisis was brought about by the Labour Government's lack of long-term planning between 1974 and 1979. The reason is simple. When the present Lord Carlisle was the Under-Secretary of State in the Home Office in 1972, he produced a report, which was accepted by the Government, proposing a long-term prison building programme. In 1975, the Labour Government shelved that programme when they were going cap in hand to the International Monetary Fund because of their economic policies. As a consequence, in 1979 the incoming Conservative Government inherited the problem of no long-term prison building programme and that has created the present crisis.

The drive to build new prisons, which my hon. Friends have set in train, will eventually begin to solve the problem. Meanwhile, there is a shortage of prison places, so we must look for alternative ways of dealing with the problem. That is why I say that there must be a new sentencing manifesto. Although it will not be included in the Bill, I hope that consideration will be given to that matter.

The second problem — stemming from a lack of prison places—that has led to the crisis is the fact that, because of the shortage, magistrates and judges have been pressured into having a ladder-type sentencing policy. That involves avoiding sending a convicted person to prison, a detention centre or youth custody at all costs. What happens is that these people make four or five appearances in court before they receive any form of custodial sentencing. That increases pressure on the prison system because the sentences imposed are inevitably longer, particularly for youths, than they would otherwise be.

Young people come before the courts and have an absolute discharge, then a conditional discharge, then a supervisional one and then a care order—that is four appearances — before they are sentenced to youth custody. The same happens to adults. First they are fined, then they receive a conditional discharge, then probation orders, then community service orders, then suspended sentences and eventually they are sent to prison.

Prisons have two functions: first, punishment and, secondly, rehabilitation.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): They have failed.

Mr. Hind: Prisons have failed for many of the reasons that I have given. By the time many offenders are given custodial sentences, they believe that they can get away with crime. They have got away with it so often because of the pressures created by the Labour Government with their short-sighted policy on prison building.

Perhaps we should consider sending people to prison sooner for shorter periods. Many prison governors would agree with me that in old-fashioned prisons where there are three men to a cell, slopping in and out, somebody who is locked up for a fortnight will remember it. If prisoners are released after a short sentence, they will not have become used to the system, and the deterrent effect of the unpleasantness of the prison will still burn in their mind. Then comes the next stage of rehabilitation.

Perhaps my hon. Friends will consider combining short prison sentences with supervisional community service, particularly for those who are offending for the first or second time. The sentences can be so short that offenders can use their holiday entitlement to serve their sentence, as a consequence of which they will not lose their job. We must consider flexibility in sentencing and ensure that the deterrent effect of serving a sentence is burning in offender's minds when they are released and that they are not used to the prison system as is the case with longer sentences. If we close the door behind offenders for a short time, we shall provide a real deterrent.

I urge my hon. Friends to consider Holland's weekend prison system. I know that it has flaws, but it is an alternative. People working during the week give up their time at weekends to serve their sentences. That is particularly appropriate for football hooligans and for violent offenders who get drunk in public houses and fight in the evenings. Such people can be adequately punished in that way. I urge those thoughts for the future, perhaps not for inclusion in the Bill but as the beginning of a way forward. The Conservative party has taken a radical step in the review of sentencing policy as a whole. Punishment is part of any custodial sentence, which should not be a pleasant experience. Rehabilitation is the other aspect, but punishment is quite important.

I hope that in Committee the Government will bring in an amendment abolishing the right to silence in a police station. For too long, that ancient prerogative has protected guilty men. It came into existence at a time when defendants could not give evidence at their own trial. It was unfair that they should have to give an explanation without warning which they could not subsequently deny when the matter came to trial. That situation, however, has long since ceased to exist. Following the Criminal Evidence Act 1892, defendants have been able to give evidence. Some say that that is the best thing that ever happened for the prosecution, but that is another matter. Many further safeguards have since been built into the law. The defendant can have his solicitor present. His statements can be tape-recorded. If no tape recorder is available, contemporaneous notes are made of every question and answer and every page is signed. There can be no greater safeguards, so do we need the right to silence?

I commend my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's remarks about taking one step forward. I hope that he will include such a step in the Bill. The public cannot understand why a person charged with rape can refuse to make any comment to police officers investigating the case and later, through his counsel, suggest for the first time that the girl in the witness box consented to sexual intercourse with him. That cannot be allowed to continue. The Bill is an opportunity to end that situation.

The simple solution is to tell the defendant that if he refuses to answer the legitimate questions of the police it will count against him in his trial and when in the witness box he may be asked for an explanation. The right to silence is a fossil and it is time that it was ended. The Bill provides an opportunity to deal with the problem.

I am not alone in pressing that course. A recommendation was made 15 years ago by the Criminal Law Revision Committee, of which Lord Justice Lawton was chairman, but we are still saddled with the problem. As a result, the number of cases cleared up in the past few years, especially since the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, has declined. If there were an obligation for the defendant to say something, I believe that the clear-up rate and the number of convictions would increase, because the defendant could not hide behind a mechanism which operates against the interests of the state, the victim and everyone else concerned in the case.

Finally, the Bill includes much-needed advances in relation to victims. I have already referred to children. The Criminal Injuries Compensation Board will have new powers to sort out that long-standing problem. As a statutory body, its position will be much clearer. The Government have encouraged victim support associations, of which I am proud to be a president, and have pursued area watch schemes and many other new ideas in crime prevention. The Bill takes many of those Conservative ideas a further step forward. It is a major piece of legislation which will improve the detection of crime and safeguard its victims. I commend it to the House.

8.46 pm

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): As others have pointed out, we are debating these measures at a time when crime in this country has reached record levels. The reason for those record levels is directly related to the Government's policies. I was astonished to hear the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) seek to blame the Labour Government for most of the crimes committed under the Conservatives. The facts speak differently.

In the city of Leicester and in the county of Leicestershire, in some areas crime has risen by 100 per cent. or sometimes even 200 per cent. Pleas by the chief constable, Michael Hirst, for more officers to patrol the outer estates and the inner-city areas have fallen on deaf ears. The Government seem to think that they can solve the problem of crime by building more prisons. In fact, what is needed is a commitment by the Government to build more homes, to provide a decent social services system, and to reform and revitalise the National Health Service.

Bearing in mind that offenders are likely to reof building prisons will not solve the underlying prob The Bill will not solve the underlying problems of and vandalism in the outer estates of Leicester suc Thurnby Lodge, Rowlatts Hill and Northfields. demand there, like the plea of the chief constable, more resources and a better system of justice.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Birming Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was right to talk of the in our criminal justice system. In part, the crisis de from the method of sentencing, the type of magist recruited to the bench and the log jam of cases yet heard. In many major cities, the Crown prosecu service is also in crisis. After almost a year, half the for lawyers in the Leicestershire Crown prosecution se have still not been filled because lawyers are not conf to join a system which is in crisis. The Bill continues a course of action which began in 1967 to restrict remove the rights of defendants.

I wish briefly to refer to the clause dealing with peremptory right of challenge and to trace the histo the way in which jurors' rights have been removed. heard from the hon. Member for Lancashire, West th was his fervent hope that the Government would ab the right to silence. I am a solicitor and I practised i North Leicester advice centre for more than a year a half; and before that I practised in other law centr remember noting when I read my textbooks wh became a lawyer that our system of justice entren certain rights that are necessary to protect the defen because we are supposed to have a fair system of ju in this country.

By removing the peremptory right of challenge, th continues a path that was started in 1967 with the abol of the unanimity verdict. That path was continued in with the removal of certain cases from juries. In 197 process of jury vetting began, and in 1984 the numb people disqualified from sitting on juries was double the Juries (Disqualification) Act. The latest ch proposed in the Bill will ensure that defendants will n tried by their peers—people who are representativ the community. As we know, juries are not represent of the community. I believe that that will specifically a black people and women and cases that may have r connotations or cases involving rape for which there be all-male or all-white juries.

Another clause in the Bill seeks to extend from eig 28 days the period of remand in custody. We heard ea that the prisons are overcrowded. Welford road pris Leicester is the most overcrowded prison in the cou Despite that, and despite the fact that the Governmen not prepared to provide additional resources for governor of the prison on an emergency basis, I received no representations from the prison governo the prison officers to the effect that they would sup any plan to extend the time allowed for a defendan remand.

With its present eight-day limit, the remand hea provides an opportunity for defendants to apply befor magistrates for a change in status and possibl reapplication for bail. That allows solicitors opportunity to meet the defendants at the courts, and is slightly better than a solicitor meeting the defenda prison. It gives the prisoner an opportunity to meet fri and relatives, which may not have been possible in prison; and we must remember that that prisoner has not been convicted.

The cost arguments put forward by the Government are not sustainable. Even though there has been a large increase in costs to the legal aid system, I hazard a guess that it would be cheaper for a solicitor to see a client at the magistrates court where he or she might be able to see other clients than it would be for solicitor to a go to prison to see a remand prisoner.

Another clause concerns the proposal to allow the prosecution to appeal against excessively lenient sentences. I believe that that would give the prosecution an opportunity to try a defendant twice. Once a defendant has been through the distress of a trial, he would have to be brought before a higher court and receive a more severe sentence. That would give the press an opportunity to perform all kinds of activities to discredit or discuss cases that have already been before a lower court.

Lord Wigoder said on 14 July 1987:

"that man will be set free, perhaps given a suspended sentence or fined heavily at, let us say, the Central Criminal Court. He will go back to his wife and children, back to his job, and will start to rebuild his life. Then, six months later or thereabouts, he will be called back to the Court of Appeal and told, 'We are very sorry. The trial judge made a mistake and you have got to go straight off to prison for 12 months.' That I described last time we debated this issue as being a piece of sheer cruelty, and I am sure that that is what it would be." —[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 July 1987; Vol. 488, c. 941.]

It would be sheer cruelty for a person to be allowed to go through a trial and then, on the advice of the prosecution, for the Attorney-General to seek to take matters further.

Just to show that Oppostion Members are not killjoys and prepared to accept none of the Government's proposals, may I say that I am pleased by the advances that will be made in the Bill concerning video-linked evidence and the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board. It is high time that children were spared the distress of having to go through the court procedure. I would like to see video linking extended to all courts, including the juvenile court, where children are placed in difficulties during care proceedings if they have to give evidence against their parents.

I hope that the Minister will confirm in his reply that it is important that defendants are given the right to examine the video properly and question the evidence that it contains, including the right to question the technical nature of how any video evidence was taken. That important safeguard should be protected in the same way that in certain police stations in Leicester where tape recordings are made of defendants giving evidence the defendant can challenge that evidence and is assured of the important safeguards that are taken to protect what he says.

I welcome the Government's decision to place the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board on a statutory basis and to allow an appeal on a point of law from a decision of the board. However, I should like legal aid to be available for applications to the board. The board should be given a statutory power to award costs. When the Legal Aid Bill reaches this House from the other place, I am sure that we will see the Government's real intentions with regard to legal aid. The Government aim to cut legal aid and, in their words, cut costs. That means that justice will have a price on its head. It is important that victims of crime should have legal aid to argue complex legal arguments before the board.

It is important that the Minister, when he replies, should tell us how much money will be made available to publicise the schemes. I found at the law centre where I worked, and the local citizens advice bureau has informed me, that insufficient Government resources are available to publicise them. It is possible that people are unaware that they have such rights. In Leicester, we have a victim support scheme which provides such information. However, it is run on a shoestring and is not in receipt of any substantial payments from central or local government. If the Minister is prepared to put aside a great deal of money to publicise such schemes, the welcome changes proposed in the Bill will have been worth it.

The Bill could have changed many of the inadequacies and imperfections of our criminal justice system. Instead of doing that, it seeks to restrict the rights of individuals in an unconstructive way. I hope that in Committee suitable amendments will be incorporated to bring the delays in our courts system to a rapid conclusion.

8.59 pm

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): The Bill provides a number of important messages. The first is that the Government and the Conservative party are not prepared to tolerate violent crime. For that reason, I welcome the provision that increases the maximum sentence for carrying firearms from 14 years to life imprisonment. In 1986, the last year for which figures are available, far too many robberies were committed with the use of firearms. The Bill provides the clear message that those who seek to use firearms to perpetrate offences risk substantial prison sentences.

Likewise, I welcome the fact that the law is to be tightened considerably in regard to those who go out armed with knives. There has been a distrubing growth in the use of knives in the perpetration of offences. Therefore it is to be welcomed that there are provisions for strengthening the law dealing with the sale and possession of offensive weapons, and that it will be an offence to have, in a public place, a blade or a sharply pointed instrument without good reason.

Secondly, the Government and the Conservative party are not prepared to tolerate child abuse. For far too long, child abuse has been a growing concern. It is right that steps should be taken to combat the evil of physical and sexual abuse of children. I welcome the fact that the Bill will enable child witnesses to give evidence by live video link when the offence is a sexual or violent assault.

For far too long child abuse has been a hidden crime, and the Bill is to be welcomed for giving greater protection to children. It will also ensure that the fact that there is no corroborative evidence is no longer a barrier to conviction in child abuse cases. That has often created a sense of great injustice, and on occasions has provided an artificial barrier to conviction. It is right that courts should be able to consider all factors when deciding what weight should be placed on a child's evidence. It cannot be right to have artificial barriers. Therefore, it is good news that the procedures will be improved whereby children can give evidence in court and that the sentences on those who indulge in physical or sexual assault on children are to be increased so that those who are guilty of sexual or sadistic child murders will serve at least 20 years in prison.

[Mr. Tony Baldry]

The maximum penalty for attempted rape is to be life imprisonment, and the maximum sentence for indecent assault on a girl is to be 10 years. The maximum penalty for cruelty to children is to be raised from two to 10 years. It is also right that the Government will introduce an amendment to make the possession of child pornography an offence. Every effort will be made to eliminate child abuse in Britain.

Thirdly, the Government and the Conservative party are determined that no one shall be enriched or shall benefit from their crime. To that extent it is welcome that there will be new powers for the confiscation of the proceeds of crime. There is a precedent in the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986 which enabled the courts to confiscate the assets of drug traffickers, but there are many other highly profitable crimes.

It is right that the courts should have powers to retain defendants' assets in advance of a trial and thereafter on conviction to ensure that in certain circumstances those assets and proceeds of crime are forfeited. Likewise, the message must go out that if anybody indulges in complex crime such as fraud, the Bill adds to the Criminal Justice Act 1987 so that the perpetrators can no longer rely on the hope that the complexity of their crime will help to assure their acquittal.

Part II strikes a fair balance between the community and the defendant in regard to changing the rules on the admissibility of business documents. The Government have occasionally been criticised for not doing enough to combat fraud in the City of London and elsewhere, but we have had an impressive array of legislative approaches to ensure that anyone who commits fraud does not benefit from it. We have the Companies Acts of 1980 and 1981, which, among other things, made insider dealing an offence, the Insolvency Act 1985, the Lloyd's Act 1982 and the establishment of the fraud investigation group in 1985.

Those actions, with the Criminal Justice Act 1987, have ensured that every effort will be made to combat the growing incidence of fraud. We must remember that the opportunities for fraud have increased with computers. We are determined that every effort should be made to combat fraud.

Another message which should go out is that the Government and the Conservative party will ensure that the machinery of justice is always appropriate to the needs of the community as times change. Times do change, as is seen with peremptory challenge. The circumstances of the last century which necessitated peremptory challenge no longer exist. The right of the prosecution to appeal to the Court of Appeal if it feels that a sentence is too lenient must be in everyone's interests.

Perhaps too often we have had trial by newpaper. The possibility of reviewing sentences, however, must be a benefit to the trial judge and enhance respect for the machinery of justice if there is considerable public criticism of a sentence.

Several messages will go out from this debate. We will not tolerate violent crime. We will not tolerate child abuse. We will not tolerate people being enriched by the proceeds of their crime. We will not tolerate the growth in the incidence of fraud and will do everything we can to combat it. Finally, we will always ensure that the machiney of justice is capable of meeting the needs of today and is relevant to today's needs.

Let me begin however, on a positive note. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have welcomed some aspects of the Bill. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook pointed out earlier, several parts will have our support in Committee, although we shall want to examine the details and discuss whether the safeguards are adequate. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) pointed out, the case for introducing video links for children to give evidence in court is undeniable. While there must be protection for the defendants, with proper cross-examination procedures, videos are a step forward, and one for which hon. Members such as my hon. Friend have worked for some time. I hope that we shall see the introduction of such links in the near future.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook also made it clear that we shall support the Government's proposals on knives. On balance, we believe that the need to protect society against those who carry knives, and may be tempted to use them, outweighs the obvious danger to civil liberties and the potential for the reintroduction of the "sus" law.

My right hon. Friend outlined the conditions of our support. First, the proposal should not be a precedent for other changes involving the onus of proof; secondly, the power must be used sensibly if it is not to reopen old fears. We shall want to be constructive in Committee. I agree with the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) and with my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) that there are other aspects involved in the selling of such weapons, and we shall want to examine that in more detail.

Another point of agreement is part of the Government's proposals on the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board. We agree that that should be put on a statutory footing, although we have reservations—to which I shall return in a moment—about some of the other changes.

There are points in the Bill which we openly acknowledge as necessary changes. The problem is that the points that we welcome are more than outweighed by the negative side of the Bill, not to mention the lost opportunities for real reform. At present, people who come into direct contact with the criminal justice system are all too often being denied their rights. All too often, victims of crime are forgotten and do not receive the support that they need. Suspects are not awarded adequate protection from injustice. Offenders are often inappropriately sent to prison and subject to degrading and overcrowded conditions where the chance of rehabilitation becomes zero.

Those who have to operate the system—the police, prison officers and probation officers—face problems and conditions that make their job increasingly difficult. The Government's new regime for prison officers, Fresh Start, has brought with it a number of serious difficulties in manning levels. This is not the time to discuss the problems in detail, but the difficulties facing the Government are, in part, the result of the significant inadequacy and the faults of our criminal justice system and of the Government's failure to act or to win the confidence of those who work in this area.

The sum total of all that is an increasing loss of confidence in the system on all sides. We should therefore be discussing proposals which would be likely to come to grips with the task and establish a system which is efficient, effective and fair. Unfortunately, we are instead discussing a Bill which contains no coherence. The Bill is a lost opportunity. It is unlikely that we shall debate legislation of this kind again for many years.

In addition, the Bill is likely to make the situation worse in several respects. I am thinking particularly of the crisis of overcrowding in our prisons. When all those involved in the system are considering alternative ways of dealing with offenders, rather than sending them to prison, the Government propose measures which are likely to result in adding to the prison population, when our priority should be to reduce it. Those proposals include increasing the penalty for the illegal possession of firearms to life imprisonment. I assure Conservative Members that the Police Federation is concerned that, if the penalty for carrying firearms is the same as the penalty for using them, there is no deterrent to the criminal who is tempted to use a firearm in pursuit of crime, as the hon. and learned Member for Burton said.

Other measures which may increase the prison population include giving the prosecution the opportunity to challenge the so-called excessively lenient sentences, giving the courts the power to place juveniles in custody when they refuse to take part in a specified activity and increasing the length of time between bail hearings from eight days to 28 days, all of which will put even more pressure on our prisons.

I wish to consider the different groups involved in the working of our criminal justice system and how the Bill affects them. The rights of suspects will be greatly eroded by the Bill and that fact, which most threatens civil liberties, should be important to the House. We all wish to see the guilty convicted, but we also wish to ensure that all individuals are treated fairly under the law and that the chances of miscarriages of justice are minimal.

The removal of the prima facie rule in extradition will take away an important safeguard from the political refugee and will deny protection to the individual from being extradited on flimsy evidence. Removing the right to peremptory challenge could unfairly prejudice the defendant's situation where, for example, as my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood said, a black defendant is faced with an all-white jury, or where the prosecution exercises its right to stand by or, in some cases, vet the jury. It is not a question of a jury providing justice, but of confidence in our jury system.

The hon. and learned Member for Burton, with whom I am surprised to agree so much, described the Government's proposals as nonsense and as a confidence trick which would not lead to more convictions. He said that it hurt him to agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook, but I look forward to working with the hon. and learned Gentleman in Committee, three-line Whip or not, as he said—[Interruption.] We shall have to see what develops on some of the interesting points where there was agreement across the Benches.

The proposal to remove more cases from being tried by jury will serve only to add to the erosion of jury trial that has taken place over the past few years and will be important to certain people. We all know that the pressures on our courts are increasing because of the increasing levels of crime, and we know that the Government are anxious, as we all are, that congestion in Crown courts be tackled, but it is unfortunate that the Government did not wait until they could judge the effects of their own measures introduced in 1986 to deal with that problem.

[Mrs. Taylor]

The defendant's rights will be further eroded by the provision to allow written documentary evidence to be admissible in court, even when the individual who made the statement or comment is not available for cross-examination. It is unacceptable that a judge will, for example, be able to declare admissible an individual's comment made at the scene of the crime and recorded by a police officer in his notebook even though the individual is not present in court.

When we examine the way in which offenders are treated by the Bill, we find little with which we can agree. We believe that if offenders are to be prevented from reoffending, we must deal with them both fairly and constructively. In that sense, the criminal justice system must serve them, too. By doing that effectively, it can help to prevent reoffending and further protect the community.

We cannot see the merit in giving the Attorney-General the power to send a case to the Court of Appeal, to consider a sentence that he believes to be unduly lenient. That would mean subjecting the offender to a form of double jeopardy and would give the prosecution two opportunities. Because the Attorney-General will make his decision largely on the basis of reports from the prosecution, that will inappropriately involve the prosecution in matters of sentencing. It will also involve the Attorney-General, a Minister of the Government, in the sentencing policy of the courts.

It was interesting to note that the new unholy alliance between the hon. and learned Member for Burton and my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook operated in that matter as well, as both had what the hon. and learned Gentleman called enough political nous to realise what the Home Secretary did not — the pressure that the Attorney-General would be under from the tabloid press. We believe that the danger of political considerations being introduced or being thought to have been included in that process makes the proposal unacceptable and potentially unjust for the individual being sentenced.

The Government's proposals for offenders concentrate, however, on juveniles and on pursuing custody as the way of dealing with them. That is despite the fact that 76 per cent. of boys leaving detention centres after short sentences of four months or less are reconvicted within two years, while supervised activity projects are demonstrating that they have a much better success rate in turning young people away from crime, which is surely one of our main objectives.

While I am on the subject of young offenders, I must say that I find it incredible that the Government's proposal of a unified custodial sentence allows for sexual discrimination in the sentencing of boys and girls. Boys are to be detained from the age of 14, while for girls the age is 15. I hope that the Government will not persist in setting such an example of sex discrimination and that any change to correct that discrimination will not worsen the situation for girls by making the age limit 14 for all.

The Government have made much of their apparent concern for the victims of crime, yet, as is often the way with the Government, concern is not completely matched by action. It is true that at last the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board is to be put on a statutory basis, which is to be welcomed, but, having co principle, the Government have moved on t pinching exercise for those who need help most the poorer members of society. We should rem those who live in deprived areas are most lik victims to crime. Therefore, they are most like the most help.

Yet under the Bill it is possible that people in might lose their supplementary benefit if assumes that any compensation paid to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board in allowance for loss of benefit. The Government it possible to make two exceptions—compen rape and for funeral expenses. That is commen why cannot the Government do that for victim violent crimes? Where is the logic in the Gov position?

Should a victim who is on supplementa unfortunately suffer severe injuries as a result that is bad enough for him or her to qualify for of more than £3,000, or if compensation paymen victim's total income-generating capital above th or she will find that he or she is no longer supplementary benefit. Thus, the benefit of p compensation payment will be cancelled. The person who receives compensation will benefit any payment. The Government are claiming to b of the victim, as long as he or she is not poor, une elderly, disabled or living in a deprived area.

I should like clarification of clause 107, which the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board with to withhold and reduce compensation in circumstances. One of the criteria provided gives convictions or unlawful conduct as a re implementing the clause and withholding comp I know that the matter has been discussed previ it still needs clarification.

What does the Bill mean by unlawful conduc is not a criminal conviction? Secondly, must the conviction be in relation to the event for which is being made, or could it be a completely conviction?

We accept that an individual should not be compensation where he or she has perpetrated o in executing the crime in which the injury However, it cannot be fair if the clause refer conviction whatsoever. The provisions for victim not adequate, and those for suspects and offen positively damaging.

Another major criticism of the Bill concerns does not contain—what it has failed to deal wi many reforms are urgently needed. My right hon the Member for Sparkbrook outlined some of new disciplinary system for prisons, whi Government promised in their White Paper, a s code of standards for penal establishments, the re Crown immunity from prisons, statutory guidel custody and a reduction in the length of some se

We must make every effort to replace custody, cases, with more effective alternative ways which better opportunity for rehabilitation, especia currently, four out of five prisoners have been c of non-violent offences. The Home Secretary s severe sentences were appropriate for severe and crimes, but the majority of our prison populatio prison for crimes that fall outside those categorie

We should be seeking other forms of punishment and treatment, but in seeking alternative methods of treatment we should avoid turning to inappropriate and gimmicky measures such as electronic tagging, which is expensive and inefficient and is not the answer to overcrowded prisons.

Substantial measures are needed to improve the efficiency of our court system and reduce the unacceptable delays in cases coming to trial. One measure that could be effective is the 110-day rule that operates in Scotland. When pressed, the Home Secretary said that he would be making a statement soon. We would have had more confidence in the Home Secretary's conclusions had he volunteered that information rather than having it dragged out of him. We shall have to wait and see what develops on that proposal.

We are also badly in need of more effective procedures for bringing possible miscarriages of justice back before the courts. Recent cases have demonstrated that we do not have an adequate system for dealing with these matters and that a more effective procedure is required urgently if confidence in the system is to be maintained. The Home Secretary should not underestimate the importance of all sections of the population having confidence in our criminal justice system.

The Home Secretary said that these changes should be the last major changes in this area for many years. Unfortunately, the Bill is inadequate to meet its task and to warrant that description. The basic reason why the Government have their legislation wrong is that they are responding to individual problems as they arise. The Government have adopted a piecemeal approach to what should be a comprehensive and overall review of criminal justice. They have not, as they should have, gone back to first principles and examined the aims and the problems of our criminal justice system.

The Home Secretary should have outlined what we require from the system and then sought to introduce the necessary reforms. Some parts of the Bill might have formed part of that review while other parts of it definitely would not. The Home Secretary turned his back on that approach, and seems to be afraid to go back to first principles. We cannot help but wonder why. He must know what is required, but then he knew what was required last Friday when he feebly tried to defend the indefensible when opposing the Protection of Official Information Bill, which was introduced by the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd).

Today, as on Friday, the powers that be in the Government, or perhaps the power—power seems to exist only in the singular—are not prepared to let the right hon. Gentleman do what he knows is required. Instead, we see the Government opting for simplistic answers to complex problems. Their attitude is simple and is as follows: the incidence of crime is increasing, so let us be tougher with criminals, and with suspects, too. That seems to be the sum total of their response. As a consequence, the Bill reduces the rights of accused and of suspects. It does nothing to help accused or the convicted. It does nothing either to increase their confidence in the system of justice.

Some Conservative Members would argue that that does not matter. They would not attach much importance to the rights of the suspected, the accused or even those convicted of crime. However, the rights of these people do matter, and for two principal reasons. First, despite the events of last Friday, we live in a democracy, not a tin- dictatorship, and in a democracy each individual rights. These are rights that we are charged w protecting.

The second reason is a practical one. The way in wh we treat offenders matters because, unless we s alienating offenders from the rest of society, we shall little to reduce the rate of reoffending. The regularity w which those who come before the courts get caught i vicious circle of crime is one of the major social proble in Britain. Recidivism is an enormous problem, yet Government ignore it, despite their so-called conc about crime rates generally.

The Government's attitude to crime is simplistic. Th think primarily about punishment and little abo preventing those who have offended from doing so aga Preventive action would be real crime prevention; it wo be meaningful and lasting. The absence of any attempt deal with that in the Bill is an obvious major defect, a is a result of the Home Secretary looking over his should as a response to calls for more punishment. He is probal going against his own better instinct in opting simplistic solutions.

The Opposition believe that new criminal just measures should be based on the principle outlined in c amendment. There should be equal rights under the l and equal access to the process of justice. The Bill is n based on that principle. Instead, it consists of a series simplistic solutions which ignore the major problem. Th is why we tabled our amendment and why we shall vo for it.

9.34 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. John Patte We are grateful to the hon. Member for Dewsbury (M Taylor) for announcing the official Opposition's suppo for those bits of the Bill that she feels the Opposition c support.

The debate has been generally constructive, almo always interesting and sometimes positively thoug provoking. The right hon. and learned Member f Warley, West (Mr. Archer) gave us something to thi about. I do not know whether he regards this as compliment but I shall read his speech tomorrow to gle some of the nuances of his suggestions about the need keep long-term strategy in mind while legislation rolls o One must always think about the next stages.

There were equally stimulating and thought-provoki speeches by my hon. and learned Friend the Member f Burton (Mr. Lawrence) and the hon. and learned Memb for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), whom we welcome to t Chamber. It must be a pleasant relief for him to be he away from the delightful muddle of alliance polic making. [Interruption.] I see the hon. and learn Gentleman is indicating assent, which I am sure will recorded tomorrow in the Official Report. Welcome to t real world and thanks for the speech.

We are extremely grateful to the right hon. Member f Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and the ho Member for Dewsbury for the general Opposition suppo for the principles of what the Government wish to do knives, although I understand that a number of ho Members think that the measures could be improved. especially welcome the strong support of my hon. Frien the Members for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) and f Kingswood (Mr. Hayward). I know that my hon. ar learned Friend the Member for Burton would prefer greater stringency at the point of sale, but we feel that clause 130 can adequately deal with that. We can return to that point in Committee.

I am sorry that I was not in the Chamber to hear any of the speech of the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser). I know how worried he is about the carrying and use of knives in his constituency. I believe that he spoke of the "fashion"—a terrible word to use—of knife-carrying. He obviously wants that fashion to be turned into something very unfashionable. The hon. Gentleman welcomed the possession offence in clause 128, although he has some doubts about other aspects of what my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and I would wish to see in the clauses on knives.

I wonder whether the hon. Member for Norwood and I shall find ourselves on the same Committee. I seem to have spent most of the past two or three years on Housing Bill Committees with the hon. Gentleman. I remember when we discussed the virtue of Donizetti's opera "Lucia di Lammermoor", which was highly irrelevant to that part of the private rented sector. We were reforming at the time and the hon. Gentleman produced a little-produced opera, also by Donizetti, known as "Amelia di Liverpool". We shall welcome more of that if the hon. Gentleman is on the Committee.

On lenient sentences, the hon. Member for Dewsbury made the extraordinary suggestion that it would be inappropriate for my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, who is in the Chamber, to scrutinise the convictions that might be referred to the Court of Appeal. She criticised the possibility of my right hon. and learned Friend acting in that way and regarded it as being overtly political. She thought that it would give the Executive too much control over the judiciary. She should tell that to Mr. Malcolm Dean, a journalist for The Guardian, who had the effrontery during the past two general elections to stand as a candidate for what was then known as the Social Democratic Party in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. C. Patten).

Mr. Dean was soundly beaten both times, but he is known as an accurate journalist. In The Guardian on 9 September 1983, he accurately recorded:

> "Mr. Roy Hattersley, Labour spokesman on home affairs, came out unequivocally yesterday for more controls over the judiciary . . . The key to shorter sentences would be more controls over the judiciary."

I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman still holds that view. I entirely agree with my hon. Friends the Members for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin), for Derby, North (Mr. Knight), for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) and for Ipswich (Mr. Irvine) that the strengthened provision to enable the Court of Appeal to increase an unduly lenient sentence, on reference to the Attorney-General, is a clear signal that justice must be done and be seen to be done.

Mr. Hayward rose——

Mr. Patten: I think I can read the mind of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood. If he will allow me to continue, he will be able to test whether I can in a moment. If I cannot, he can then intervene.

I have listened to the objections of Opposition Members, but they have put forward no alternative proposal for dealing with over-lenient sente a problem, not because the courts are us over-lenient sentences, but because a sentence is a serious matter of grave public it occurs.

Mr. Bermingham: Will the hon. Gentle

Mr. Patten: I must first deal with my pr what my hon. Friend the Member for Kin have asked if I had let him. As I said, a sentence is a matter of great public misleading to say, as did the right hon. Sparkbrook, that the defendant will be in do The person being prosecuted will receive onl —the proper one—which will be handed Court of Appeal. Without that, public c continue to be undermined. On the point

Mr. Hattersley: I wonder whether the Mi what the noble Lord Wigoder said in the H He described a situation in which a sente completed his sentence and returned to his discover that an additional period would b sentence. How does the Minister regard th sentence and not a double jeopardy?

Mr. Patten: The eventual sentence will one for the crime. That is a matter of fact.

I think that my hon. Friend the Kingswood wanted to know why and how referred to my right hon. and learned Friend General. My right hon. and learned Friend hear of a sentence that might justifiably be Court of Appeal under clause 34 in a va Counsel at the trial might draw it to the at Crown prosecution service, or the Attorney-G be approached directly by a number of peo hon. Members. I shall now give way to the for St. Helen's, South (Mr. Bermingham).

Mr. Bermingham: Can the Minister rea many other practising lawyers that he does that the present sentencing guidelines of Appeal, and the activities of the Lord Department in respect of the appointme recorders and recorders, are wholly inadequ they have not been doing their jobs for son

Mr. Patten: These important issues have with the matter under discussion, which conc number of lenient sentences that could oc guidelines are available to the High Court a

Mr. Archer rose——

Mr. Patten: On the issue of child victi Friends the Members for Banbury (Mr. Ba Stockton, South, my hon. and learned Friend for Burton, the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mrs. Golding) and the hon. Member for Yn Jones) have all given their support to what Friend the Home Secretary intends to do victims. I welcome the all-party consensus to issue. I believe also that there is all-party con the Bill's provision for the better treatment o hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Nor Hampson) spoke about that issue.

The hon. Member for Dewsbury rather ov very substantial extra resources that my right the Secretary of State for the Home Department is committing to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board. Another £114 million over the next three years is not an inconsiderable sum to devote to putting right the problems faced by victims. The hon. Lady totally ignored the substantial sums that we are giving to victim support schemes, all of which have been initiated by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: Does the Minister acknowledge that the reason for the need to increase expenditure in this sphere is the vast increase in crime under the Government? Will he comment on the discriminatory way in which people on supplementary benefit will be affected by his rules?

Mr. Patten: I have always agreed with those who say that crimes are committed by criminals. It is absurd for the hon. Lady to suggest that crime has risen under this Government. [Interruption.] I shall explain to the chortling Opposition Front-Bench team on home affairs that, alas, crime has gone up for the last 30 years in good times and in bad, in times of feast and in times of famine. The Opposition cannot get away from that.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook criticised the proposal to abolish the right of peremptory challenge. I know that this issue is of interest to many hon. Members. As many hon. Members have said, in the past the justification for peremptory challenge was that it provided a safeguard for the defendant in circumstances quite different from those that apply today. Both the most recent reductions in the number of peremptory challenges, were made by Labour Governments in 1948 and in 1977 when the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook was on the then Labour Government Front Bench. The number now stands at three, but they are no longer needed because the defendant is adequately protected without them.

In modern circumstances it is positively objectionable that the defence should be able to influence the composition of a randomly selected jury even though it can show no good reason against the selection of a particular juror. The juror has come to court to do his or her duty. He or she — in this case "he", given the example that I shall use — does not wish to be challenged and finds himself unceremoniously bundled off the jury because he is wearing a tie and reading The Daily Telegraph. Nor does he wish to be bundled off the jury for not wearing a tie and wearing The Guardian. [Interruption.] I should have said for reading The Guardian. In some circumstances some people do wear The Guardian and many people suggest that that is one of the best uses for that paper on a cold night.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery complained about the peremptory challenge, but his complaint was rather odd and eccentric. I think this was the only occasion on which I have seen him display that characteristic Liberal trait of eccentricity. He criticised our willingness, announced by my noble Friend the Earl of Caithness, to narrow the circumstances in which the Crown prosecution could use its right to stand by jurors. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery said that this would hamper the prosecution, and he gave what seemed to be a rather dubious example from his experience as a prosecutor. I shall say no more about that.

However, my noble Friend the Earl of Caithness, then Minister of State, Home Office, gave his undertaking in response to pressure by the noble Lord Wigoder experience in the criminal law is widely respected warmly received the undertaking. Perhaps it is to to look to the alliance for unanimity, but that is striking contradiction in alliance policy. On the the issue, it seems that it is right to confine the righ prosecution to stand by to the minimum consist justice, and that is what we have done.

On extradition, one thing that has been forgotten during the debate is that different legal use different procedures to filter out cases which not be brought to trial. This includes Scotland, whe are no committal proceedings similiar to those sout border. So even within the kingdom we have systems. That point might have been taken by the h learned Member for Montgomery.

The reform of extradition law has been comme by many hon. and right hon. Members and h welcomed by many people. The prima facie requ in extradition works against us, not for us. The rec principle means that we must often establish a prin case in civil law jurisdictions which are unfamiliar concept. That could lead to us failing to c criminals, and that has been overlooked by those wh criticised the prima facie requirement, which is propose to disapply that requirement.

I cannot understand why the Labour Front Ben changed their tune since the passage through Co of the Criminal Justice Bill 1987, because du passage the hon. Member for Islington, Sou Finsbury (Mr. Smith), speaking with the full mig authority of someone on the Labour Front Benc that he was satisfied with the undertakings of my h learned Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mell withdrew the amendments, which were never retu by the Labour Front Bench during Committee extremely hard to understand why in 1987 th Member for Islington, South and Finsbury withdr amendments and there has now been a major cha tune.

The Bill must be seen in the context of the un commitment of the Government to strengthening c justice over the past eight years. My right hon. Fri Home Secretary and I have outlined the ways in wh Criminal Justice Bill will further strengthen our n defences against crime. It will make important im ments to court procedures, it will toughen our resp international crime, it will increase the protection to children and it will improve the position of vict crime, amongst the many other issues it deals with

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Will m hon. Friend pause to remind the House of the pressure for the reforms in the Bill whereby the C Appeal can repair the damage done by eccentric ju first instance?

Mr. Patten: I would not want to comment c member of the judiciary, but I entirely agree that the been considerable pressure from many people to co the possibility of referring allegedly lenient sentences Court of Appeal.

I have three things to say to the right hon. Mem Sparkbrook. First, he has not given us much o thinking about alternatives to custody. He has about the need to have fewer people in prison, but not come forward with any positive ways of dealing with it—the sorts of ways that might be considered when we look at the long term, such as the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West looked at. We could say that offenders do not have to go to prison, but can go to work and must pay a certain amount of their wages each week directly to the victim, or do not have to go to prison but at the weekend must do tough demanding work that is socially useful. Yes, offenders would not go to prison but, to use the Home Secretary's solicitous phrase, would be punished in the community by having to observe a curfew in their home each evening. All those elements begin to stack up to a positive alternative to custody for non-violent criminals. Electronic tagging may have an important role in that.

Mr. Fraser rose——

Mr. Patten: I hope that we shall have constructive debates in Committee. One of the chief contributions which the Labour party can make to law and order and the fight against crime is to use its influence with Labour-controlled local authorities to get them to work with, rather than to snipe at, the police. [Interruption.] Manchester and Ealing, where the Leader of the Opposition lives, are but two. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) is rather over-excitable this evening.

The role of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook has been rather inglorious. What did he do when he was a member of the Labour Government? That is a long time ago — 10 or 11 years — but he was a member of a Government who nearly brought about a police strike in 1977, with officers leaving the police force in large numbers.

What does the right hon. Gentleman do now about those local authorities which do so much to undermine law and order? Does he invite them for a quiet chat over a bite to eat at the Gay Hussar and haul them over the coals later? Not at all. He wants to give greater power to people to determine the policies, priorities and methods of the police.

In a recent speech—I bet I am the only hon. Member who has read it—in Odsal in Bradford last September, of which I have, I believe the phrase is, for greater accuracy secured a copy, the right hon. Gentleman said:

"I cannot see how a genuine partnership can exist without the election of a police authority responsible both for finance and the policy guidelines within which the police operate."

In other words, the right hon. Gentleman is suggesting the political control of the police. He goes on to reminisce about his time on a police authority 30 years previously and boasts:

"we first suspended and then dismissed a Chief Constable".

That is what he is really concerned with.

Mr. Hattersley: As the Minister has read the Odsal speech with such careful attention, I hope that he will point out to the House that the "we" to whom I referred was not the royal plural as used by the Prime Minister, but the chairman of the watch committee in Sheffield and the Conservative Home Secretary, Mr. Henry Brooke.

Mr. Patten: The right hon. Gentleman was happy to be part of that decision-making process.

My last point—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us have the last point.

Mr. Patten: My last point is just a junior Ministers, about which the rig had something to say earlier. underprivileged class — [Interruption hon. Gentleman has a good record as

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is one ask the House to listen in silence.

Mr. Patten: The best quotation fro diaries is:

"Roy Hattersley has been bluntly frank desire for promotion and also flattering By comparison, we are acting.

The Government have come strengthening the protection of law and takes it a significant stage further.

Local Government (Scotland)

10.26 pm

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Mr. Ian Lang): I beg to move,

That the Rate Support Grant (Scotland) (No. 3) Order 1987, a copy of which was laid before this House on 11th December, be approved.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps it would be for the convenience of the House if we were to debate at the same time the second motion on the Order Paper:

That the Revaluation Rate Rebates (Scotland) Order 1987, a copy of which was laid before this House on 11th December, be approved.

Mr. Lang: The main purpose of the rate support grant order is to fix the amount of rate support grants for Scottish local authorities in 1988-89, and to prescribe the allocation of the needs element to individual authorities. The order also makes adjustments, in the normal way, to rate support grants for earlier years to take account of more up-to-date information on matters such as interest rates, rateable values and provisional outturns of expenditure.

The Revaluation Rate Rebates (Scotland) Order 1987 continues revaluation rate rebates to give a fourth and final year of relief to those most affected by the 1985 revaluation.

At this time last year my predecessor was welcoming the fact that in the financial year then ending Scottish local authorities had, for the first time, planned for a lower volume of expenditure than they had incurred in 1979. It was a welcome sign of realism and the Government responded with a rate support grant settlement for the present year based on local authorities' own budgets for 1986-87, uprated for inflation, and with rate support grant sufficient to maintain the previous grant percentage. I think it is fair to say that the House generally, on that occasion, regarded the settlement as reasonable. Unfortunately, the Government's reasonableness found no ready response from local authorities that budgeted to overspend in 1987-88 by no less than £122 million—among the worst budgeted overspends that we have ever experienced. The result was large rate rises, heavy grant penalties and selective action to reduce the rates of two authorities, following approval of the House given last July.

This is not the occasion to go over that ground again, but it has posed an obvious dilemma for the Government in deciding what to do for 1988-89. The crude, if obvious, conclusion is that local authorities respond better to force majeure than to reasonableness. We have, however, decided—1988-89 being in Scotland the last year before the introduction of the community charge and correspondingly revised grant arrangements—that we shall try a further year of reasonableness, and the rate support grant settlement for 1988-89 that my right hon. and learned Friend announced to the House on 23 July last year is once again based on local authorities' actual budgets for 1987-88, with additional provision of 4 per cent. for inflation, an allowance for pay increases for teachers and other categories, and a further £12 million related to the costs of introduction of the community charge.

Aggregate Exchequer grant has been set so as once again to maintain the grant percentage. As hon. Members will be aware, decisions on those matters are taken only following exhaustive consultation with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, and I think that it is fair to record that the general terms of this settlement met almost entirely COSLA's wishes. There was a difference of view about the appropriate allowance for inflation, but the total level of provision was very close to the level that COSLA itself was seeking. I make that point now because I want to return to it in what I shall say later about local authority budgeting for 1988-89.

The order's main provisions, as I have said, concern 1988-89. Aggregate Exchequer grant has been set at £2,370·53 million. That differs slightly from the figure of £2,372 million announced by my right hon. and learned Friend on 23 July. The change arises, first, from a reduction of £3·5 million as a result of our decision to transfer some provision for urban programme spending from current to capital, to achieve a better balance on that programme, and, secondly, by the addition of £1·03 million in respect of the transfer of responsibility to local authorities for children committed to residential care by the courts. That transfer of responsibility, and the amount of provision, have been agreed with COSLA. Overall, those figures represent an increase of £178 million or 8 per cent. over the equivalent figure of aggregate Exchequer grant for 1987-88.

On grant distribution, our proposals follow the usual detailed consultation with COSLA, and indeed implement in very large measure what COSLA itself wanted. Overall, it was concerned that for this last year of the present grant arrangements, the main consideration should be stability in grant entitlements. The Government agree with that.

We estimate that £332·6 million of aggregate Exchequer grant will be paid as grants for specific services, leaving £2,037·93 million for payment as rate support grants. We propose to maintain the domestic rate relief at 7p. That is expected to cost £91·9 million in domestic element of rate support grant. Resources element compensates authorities with low rating resources. The ratio of resources element to needs element has, for the past two years, been 1:8, and we propose to maintain that ratio for 1988-89. That calls for a resources element of £215·8 million.

The remainder of the grant forms the needs element. An innovation this year is that, as a first call on the needs element, a sum has been earmarked to finance rating relief to sports clubs. That follows my right hon. and learned Friend's commitment during our consideration of the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act to remove any disincentives for local authorities to give rating relief to sports clubs. The order provides that, on the basis of estimates received from authorities, £3·2 million will be available for that purpose in 1988-89. That is, incidentally, four times the amount of relief being given to sports clubs in the present financial year and will, I hope, be regarded as a welcome follow-up to the commitment that my right hon. and learned Friend gave.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Will the Minister explain whether that is new money over and above what would have been allocated to local authorities anyway, or is it coming out of the general needs budgets that local authorities would have had anyway, so that they could spend the money on something else?

Mr. Lang: It is a transfer of the arrangements. Instead of being taken out of the resources element, which would not have applied evenly throughout all local authorities, the provision is being earmarked out of the needs element before the needs element is attributed. It will come out of the £178 million increase in needs element. Whether the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) chooses to call it new or old money, it was not there in the past. It has met its purpose, because it will give four times as much relief as is being given to sports clubs in the present year, and I hope that it will be regarded as a successful solution to this problem.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): This subject has been raised before in relation to the Linlithgow cricket ground. How will the allocations be made between various sports and who will make them? It is not a hostile question; I am asking only for clarification.

Mr. Lang: It is not for me to allocate it between different sports, if that is the hon. Gentleman's point. If he refers to the report on the rate support grant order, he will find a table in one of the annexes that gives the allocations to all local authorities. The allocation is based on local authorities' estimates of what they need to resolve this problem.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): If local authorities decide to give rate relief to sports clubs, who will make up the shortfall—the Government or the ratepayer?

Mr. Lang: The shortfall — if that is the correct expression—comes out of the increase of £178 million, which is 8 per cent. extra over the equivalent figure of aggregate Exchequer grant for last year. That is a figure of more than twice the rate of inflation, and it allows for a substantial freedom of manoeuvre within that overall figure.

The rest of the needs element has been distributed using the client group method of needs assessment. However, implementing the client group method in full would have led to grant losses, or very small grant increases for some authorities and very large gains for others. In line with the generally expressed desire for stability in grant distribution, and in response to a specific suggestion from COSLA, we have therefore decided that every authority should receive an increase in needs element of at least 4 per cent. This gives rise for a need to limit gains, and at the top end it would be 10 per cent. Details of the calculation for individual authorities are given in annex E to the report on page 19.

The order also contains adjustments to grant for back years to take account of the latest information on interest rates, rating resources and outturn expenditure. Many of these figures stand to be varied further when final audited returns are received from the local authorities. All of these adjustments are on a basis that is well understood by authorities, and I do not want to detain the House with any more detailed comments on them.

The Revaluation Rate Rebates (Scotland) Order 1987 provides for rebates in 1988-89. Up to and including the current financial year, there have been three such orders. The first, for 1985-86, provided for rebate of all rates payable on rateable value in excess of three times the 1984-85 rateable value, subject to a maximum rebate of £10,000. The orders for 1986-87 and for the current year respectively provided for 75 per cent. and 50 per cent. rebates and for maxima of £7,500 and £5,000. The Act orders together have ensured that the 1985 revaluation been gradually brought into effect for those ratepa with the greatest valuation increases. The order marks completion of these transitional arrangements, provic in 1988-89 for rebates of 25 per cent. of the rates pay on rateable values increased by more than three time 1985, subject to a maximum rebate of £2,500.

I estimate that about 130,000 domestic and ab 60,000 non-domestic ratepayers have received rebates, that the total rates rebated over the four years of scheme will amount to about £57 million. About million of this relief will have been given up to including the current financial year, and I expect t under the order, about £6 million will be rebated 1988-89.

I should like to address one or two general points. first is why we should experience such persis overspending by local authorities. Labour Members have their usual pat answers, but it is a point that dese serious consideration. It cannot be simply that Government make inadequate provision in their pu expenditure plans, or at least that cannot explain the budgeted overspend this year when provision was ba on local authorities' own plans for the previous year an inflation allowance. Nor does it appear to inadequate grant distribution arrangements. COSL fully consulted about these arrangements and, while can admittedly be rough and ready at the margins, I kn of no serious suggestion that they are fundament flawed.

The answer must be that there is an endemic capa in local government to increase its expenditure constan regardless of the consequences for its ratepayers. In so cases that is a result of simple ideology, and I do suppose I can offer any rational argument that will m any difference to that. But I have also become consci since I took on this responsibility in June 1987, that th are many authorities which consider themselves prud and moderate and which still overspend substantially guidelines despite what they regard as their best effort economy.

I invite these authorities to look again carefully at t budgeting process, and particularly at the extent to wh existing expenditure simply becomes uncritically baseline for the next planning exercise, without any seri review of whether all existing spending needs to contin or of whether policy objectives are being met in the m efficient and cost-effective way. Proposals are now be considered in another place to give the Commission Local Authority Accounts in Scotland a formal statut duty to undertake value-for-money studies in l government. The first of such studies, undertaken with the benefit of the statutory duty, has now been publis and points to possible economies among Scottish l authorities of up to £10 million a year through m effective energy management. Such studies will help c conscious local authorities in future.

There is one other aspect to this. It is frequently poin out that the actual level of inflation experienced by l authorities can be higher than that experienced in economy as a whole, and I recognise that there may something in this. But it is too ready an excuse, as many of their purchases local authorities are in a buy market. They can, if they have the will, influence the l of inflation in their own costs. They have direct cont for example, over their own wage negotiations. Having heard last July that the inflation assumption in the settlement for 1988-89 was 4 per cent., they have no one to blame but themselves if in September they conclude an agreement to increase their manual workers' pay by over 10 per cent. Every other employer in the country, including in other parts of the public sector, has to conduct pay negotiations against a predetermined background of what resources are available. There is no reason why local authorities should behave differently.

It is suggested—it is a point of view that I have heard several times in recent months—that, in line with our new national economic success, the restraints should be taken off public expenditure. But that is part of the kind of thinking that got the economy into trouble in the first place. The public sector, and public sector trade unions, have no natural right to a prescribed share of the national wealth. As a Government, we are committed to containing public expenditure, but we are committed also to ensuring that the resources are available to maintain adequate standards of public services. I believe that our record on local authority expenditure provision is a good one. But we have also to ensure that the circumstances are created and maintained in which business and commerce can operate profitably and create and maintain jobs. It is the private sector that generates the resources from which the public sector is funded. We must ensure that local government does not take a disproportionate share of public expenditure at the expense of other public services. In effect, this is what has happened in Scotland for 1988-89. I hope that it will not have to happen again.

Finally, I want to say something about reports that are now beginning to appear of local authorities' budget plans for 1988-89. Disappointingly, but no doubt unsurprisingly, we hear stories yet again of substantial expected overspends by some of the larger authorities. I would only say that there is no excuse or justification for this and that authorities which seek to justify their overspending next year by reference to their low guideline increases delude themselves and mislead the public, who will recognise that these low guideline increases arise only for authorities whose spending is historically already very high, and well in excess of their assessed needs. I warn these authorities tonight that my right hon. and learned Friend will be prepared to impose severe grant penalties again next year in response to high budgeted overspending, and will once again consider the use of his power to secure rate reductions where planned expenditure is in his view "excessive and unreasonable". But there is still time for authorities to consider their budget plans carefully, and I hope that as many as possible of them will do so and budget within guidelines, in the national interest and in the interests of their own ratepayers.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): The Minister's speech livened up a little towards the end, even though it was incredibly funny to hear his analysis of Scotland's economy and local government expenditure and his normal tirade against overspending local authorities. This time last year we were listening to Michael Ancram make such speeches, supported by nine other Conservative Members who are no longer in the House. It is not local authorities that have learnt nothing from last June's general election. It is the Minister who appears to have learnt nothing.

The people of Scotland elect the local authorities in Scotland to take decisions on expenditure and services. The only people who elected the Minister are the electors in his constituency — [Interruption.] Yes, just. The people of Scotland rejected the Conservative party and the Government and wanted nothing to do with them. It is time that the Government stopped coming to the House with the arrogant prating that we heard from the Minister.

The Minister said several times that this was the last time that we would debate rate support grant orders. I suppose that most of us would breathe a great sigh of relief if that were true, but I make a guess — perhaps a reasoned guess—that this time next year we will be back debating a similar order. An administrative nightmare has been created in Scotland by the poll tax legislation. The Government are delaying the orders which are needed to implement the poll tax if the local authorities are to have it in place by 1 April 1989. The Secretary of State for Scotland will be forced to use English legislation. The fact that the rebate scheme is to be a United Kingdom scheme is an excuse to delay implementation until 1 April 1990 at the earliest. Therefore, we will need a rate support grant order next year.

I expect that there will also be orders on penalties and variation orders. I look forward to hearing the Minister yet again putting forward a rate support grant order. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I look forward to it because at least it will mean that the poll tax will be one year further away. I should be grateful if the allocation of local government finance were handed over from this House to a democratically elected Scottish assembly in Edinburgh, but if our having to debate one more rate support grant order means one more year without the poll tax, I am prepared to put up with it. If we ever have the poll tax, the Minister will still be complaining, weeping crocodile tears about the poor taxpayers in Scotland and bringing orders to reduce the level of poll tax in what he claims are high-spending local authorities.

The Minister has tried to pretend that this settlement is generous. I confess that it is. There has at least been a standstill compared with previous settlements. It would be perverse not to admit that. But it is another of the Government's con tricks to pretend that they are generous and that the local authorities and the people of Scotland should go down on their knees and thank the Government. The idea that the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities agreed to this sort of settlement beggars belief. Of course, there is consultation. Of course, COSLA says, "If you can do nothing more, at least keep us at the same point we were at last year." But that is not what the local authorities or COSLA want. They want a much more generous settlement.

Let us look at what has happened since 1979.

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Vice-Chamberlain of Her Majesty's Household): Labour has lost three elections.

Mr. Maxton: The hon. Gentleman from an English constituency says that the Government won three elections. They have lost three elections in succession in Scotland and every local government election in Scotland since 1979. They are now hanging on by no more than their fingernails to what little support they have. The Government have Englishmen sitting in the Whips' positions—the hon. Members for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) and for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean)— because they cannot find a Scottish Whip from among their remnant of 10 hon. Members representing Scottish seats. The hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) is the only Scottish Member on the Government Benches who has been neither a Minister nor a Whip. I know that he takes great pleasure in that.

In 1979, the level of rate support grant was 68·5 per cent. This year, even at a standstill, it will be 55·4 per cent. of expenditure. That does not take account of any clawbacks that may reduce it to an even lower figure. If the Government, with the generosity that they claim for themselves, were giving Scotland a 68·5 per cent. rate support grant this year, local authorities would receive another £557 million. What could local authorities provide in services for the unemployed, the single parents, the old and the children in our schools if they had that money to spend?

It is not good enough for Ministers to say that this is a generous settlement. Even in the Government's own terms, it is not as generous as the Minister would have us believe. He has claimed that the relevant current expenditure is an increase of 8·6 per cent. on the provision for this year, which is true. But it is only 4 per cent. above the level of current local authority budgets, plus the cost that he has identified to take into account the implementation of the poll tax and the new rebate scheme for housing benefit that is coming into force in April this year. Merely to stand still and maintain services as they now are, therefore, local authorities——

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North) rose——

Mr. Maxton: I shall finish the point. Local authorities will have to keep current levels of expenditure on services within that 4 per cent. increase. So if the RPI increases by more than 4 per cent., authorities will find that they have to cut back on services, or increase their rates. If, as is even more likely, local government services' costs rise by more than 4 per cent.—that has been normal in the past few years—local authorities will have to cut back on what they are doing.

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. Gentleman mentioned that an allowance had been made for the administration of changes in housing benefit. Nothing in what he has said thus far—or, indeed, ever before—draws attention to the fact that, with the increased rents of the past few years, the huge increase in housing benefit has all gone directly into the housing coffers, which is really public money going into local government. So how have there been cuts?

Mr. Maxton: The reason why a massive increase in housing benefit has gone to local authorities is that more people are in need — more unemployed and elderly people need the help that the state should provide. On 1 April this year, thousands of people in Scotland will lose the housing benefit of which the hon. Member for Tayside, North is so proud.

Included in the 4 per cent. increase is £12 million which is allocated to implement the poll tax. No one in Scottish local authorities believes that that money will be adequate; much more will be required. Strathclyde alone is talking about having to take on 700 extra people just to draw up the register and collect the money. So the £12 million will be wholly inadequate. Because the Government will do nothing about that, services for Scottish people w to be cut, or their rates increased, to pay for the imp of a tax which the vast majority do not want an they clearly rejected last year in June. So that this can be imposed on them, the people of Scotland w to have cuts in local authority services. That obscenity.

I find it interesting that the budgets that attrac wrath of the Secretary of State in July and led withholding of £202 million of grant by the Treas now acceptable to the Government. If it is now see Government that £202 million is the amount th authorities ought to spend over and above what the last year, surely it would be logical in this year's bu restore that £202 million to local authorities.

I do not intend to go much further along this li even under this settlement some local authorities w as a result of the rate support grant. Local aut representing over half the people of Scotland will only a 3 per cent. increase in real terms in their b That has to take account of inflation and pay increa meet the last stage of the teachers' pay increase. N in Scotland believes that local authorities can m their services without increasing their rates.

Conservative Members complain about authorities increasing their rates. Those are the auth that are faced with an increase of only 3 per cent. in That means that they will have to increase their r more than the Minister wants simply to maintain s at their present level. Of course, if they increase rat Minister will claw back some of the money. authorities include Lothian, Strathclyde, Gl Edinburgh, Cumbernauld, Kilsyth and Cumnoc Doon Valley among others. I am sure that many hon. Friends who represent at least some of authorities would wish to speak in the debate t details of the effects on services.

I have already made the point about relief for clubs. It became quite clear to my hon. Friends tha is no new money for that. It is a con trick from beg to end and we warned local authorities about that. is no new money and local authorities will have t from other proposed expenditure the money that to sports clubs.

I shall now deal with the second order. When th revaluation took place there was an outcry in Sc about it, especially from the supporters of the Member for Tayside, North. The then Secretary of for Scotland, the right hon. Member for Ayr Younger), here at the whim of only 182 people in boasted about how he was being enormously gener giving rebates. He allocated £50 million in 1985-8 accept that that was new money for people whos increase was more than threefold. The amoun following year was £37·5 million and this year it million. After doing my sums, I find that it will be million next year.

The total to be spent is £57 million over four yea of a total budget of well over £100 million. That generosity of the Secretary of State. He was nev generous as he tried to make out. He should have w out a more generous scheme so that more people who hit got the money or he should have given to authorities the extra money to spend as they wishe

The Government have been rejected by the peo Scotland time and again. In every election, both loca national, since 1979 the Tory vote has gone down, the number of Tory Members of Parliament has gone down and the number of Tory councillors has gone down. Yet the Government continue arrogantly to claim that they have a right to say what is right for the people of Scotland.

The people of Scotland will have many more chances to reject the Government, and their next chance will be in May this year in the district council elections. All the evidence points to the fact that the Tory party will be kicked in the teeth yet again by the people of Scotland. Perhaps on that occasion, at long last, the Secretary of State and his "Hobson's Choice" Ministers will listen to the people of Scotland. Perhaps the Secretary of State will go to the Prime Minister and say, "I am a democrat; I believe in the will of the people of Scotland and I can no longer therefore govern Scotland and I urge you to establish a Scottish assembly that rules Scotland for the people of Scotland." That is what the Opposition want and that is what the people of Scotland want.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): The House has heard before most of the speech of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) and we shall no doubt hear it again and again, but it will be interesting to compare precisely what he said at the end of his speech with the apparant sudden U-turn by the Scottish Labour party in the Scottish Affairs Committee debate last Thursday. It sounded to me as if the Scottish Labour party still believes in the mandate argument, and that the hon. Member for Cathcart was rejecting the concept of a unitary Parliament.

Mr. Maxton: In return, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I ask the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart)—or the ex-Minister—whether he believes that there ought to be a Scottish Office? While he believes that there should be separate legislation and separate administration for Scotland, he has no right to say that the Scottish people have no right to say what happens in such a Scottish Office.

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman is in the wrong party if he pursues that line of argument, and the sooner he joins the Scottish National party the better, because that is precisely the logic of his position. Whether the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) and her colleagues would wish to accept a subscription from the hon. Member for Cathcart is another matter.

I welcome both orders, although I should like to speak solely about the rate support grant order because of limitation of time. My hon. Friend the Minister of State described the settlement as reasonable, and he was able to say that despite the valiant efforts of the hon. Member for Cathcart to find something to criticise. The settlement is fairly generous by any reasonable standards. There is an increase of provision of just under 9 per cent. which is paralleled by an increase in the aggregate Exchequer grant of 8 per cent.

Within the individual figures, my understanding is that there is a real increase in the guideline figures for every authority in Scotland and an increase of at least 3 per cent. in cash terms for all authorities' guidelines, compared with their 1987-88 budget. That settlement is very generous indeed.

I welcome what the Government are doing for sports clubs and the increase of 9 per cent. for education. However, my right hon. and hon. Friends will have to k a watchful eye on local government expenditure. question that the House must always ask is whether al this money will be spent wisely and sensibly. I do not th that the current behaviour of the Convention of Scott Local Authorities is very encouraging in that regard. take just one example, I believe that this week member the Socialist COSLA are coming down in droves to into Westminster to a mass lobby at the ratepay expense.

There is some doubt, I understand, about the lega of their expenditure. It is not my purpose to pursue t issue tonight, but I put it to the House that expenditure £40,000 or more of ratepayers' money on what is fran a jolly is outrageous. Although it is a small sum in relat to the total of local authority expenditure, it is unfortunate indication of COSLA's priorities.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Is the h Member speaking for himself or, as a former Minister he reflecting the weight of Conservative opinion Scotland? Is it the intention of Scottish Conservat Members not to meet any of the COSLA delegation Wednesday?

Mr. Stewart: I am speaking for myself, and I answer that in two ways. First, the members of Convention of Scottish Local Authorities have made absolutely clear that they regard this as an outrage waste of ratepayers' and taxpayers' money. They will meeting in Edinburgh, but, as a ratepayer in Glasgow believe that this is a outrageous waste of ratepay money. It is certainly not my intention to meet members of the convention. If they wish to come to House to lobby Members of Parliament, they should br a small and expert delegation, not everybody they can f in Scotland to come down at the ratepayers' expense.

I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister State will keep a watchful eye on local author expenditure as a result of the settlement. This year th is concern that authorities may increase their rates m than is necessary in order to raise the base for n domestic rates when the provisions of the Abolition Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act come into force.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): They ne will.

Mr. Stewart: They will, fear not. It is clear that th is the potential for local authorities to do that. I appreci that my hon. Friend the Minister may not be able comment on that possibility tonight, but I hope that he keep it under constant review.

11.6 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire) would like to make a brief contribution to the deba [Interruption.] Some rather extravagant claims are be made about the length of the future of our great allia in British politics. They are vastly exaggerated and und pessimistic; every new day brings a new dawn.

Dealing with the revaluation rebate order, I remem moving a ten-minute Bill on the need for some relief rating revaluation in 1985 and being roundly abused everybody because I was doing a fag-packet calculati as is my wont, based on my constituency and I was r enough to suggest that £15 million might make a difference if it were applied properly. I was ridiculed by Conservative Members who said that that amount of money could not be found from the Treasury. Then, before the Tory party conference in 1985, when the then Secretary of State for Scotland realised that he was on a loser, he came back with £50 million a year from the Treasury over four years. Even with my O-level arithmetic, I know that that comes to £200 million. This is the last of the four years, and we have managed to spend and allocate £57 million of that money.

I say to the Secretary of State that there is disappointment that the Government, having won the battle—I applauded the Secretary of State for having waged and won the battle for £50 million a year—did not apply that money over a wider range of subjects in order to give the relief that was then necessary and is still necessary. The Secretary of State has missed an opportunity. If he had been more generous, he would have been given credit for that.

Looking ahead, there is another revaluation waiting in the wings over five years. If we are not careful, the commercial subjects left in rating will be subject to all sorts of horrors and may well require that the precedent established in 1985, which I welcomed and continue to welcome, will have to be wheeled out again in 1990. I hope that the Secretary of State will be more generous then and learn some of the lessons which he should have learned over the four years of operation of this rebate relief scheme. He should have brought more commercial subjects into relief, and I hope that he will give that some thought between now and 1990.

I am not an expert on the rate support grant order, but I cannot understand what the Government complaint is. From the figures which the Library and COSLA have given me and the pattern of expenditure in volume terms over the past nine years, am I not right in thinking that there has been not a significant increase but a marginal one, if there has been an increase at all? If so, what is the point of rubbing the collective and individual noses of COSLA and individual authorities in this propaganda battle between central and local government in terms of the extravagant degrees of overspend and other emotive phrases such as those we have become accustomed to hearing? It does the whole political process no good when the breach in confidence and the breakdown in communications between central and local government comes to such a sorry pass.

My experience in this place is not great and I have no direct experience of local government, but it seems to me that over that period the Government have paid a high price, whatever success they may have had and however necessary the steps to constrain individual local authorities. I accept that the Government must do that, and certainly when we are the Government in the near future we shall have to face up to these problems responsibly. The Secretary of State must recognise that over the past nine years and against a background of no great increase in volume terms that I can identify, the price he has paid is generally too high. That is a political fact of life which over the past nine years we have experienced in Scotland.

It is a salutary fact that the grant percentage has been reduced from 68·5 per cent. in 1979 to 55·4 per cent. now, which is a difference of some £557 million. Therefore, if there is an argument about where the rate inc come from, it is impossible for the Government they have not, at least in large part, been resp some of these rate increases.

The Minister said, and I should like to pr this, that he thought that the incidence of retail increases as they affected local government than the average RPI figures. Have the G undertaken any detailed analysis of what that it is true, and I believe that it is, more informat be provided so that we can make more objectiv about what cost increases local authorities are they are facing increases.

There has been an element included in element of the rate support grant to meet the tea award and to deal with the rebate legislation. know whether they have been adequately cov suspect that they have not. However, I am certain, as one does not need to look far beyond the House has been showering a plethora of ot and obligations on local authorities in recent m years, for example, data protection legislation, I am partially responsible with my private Mem last year, and disabled persons legislation. There series of individual incremental increases whi together, produce real new burdens on local au

I know something about social security becau many a long hour in the 1986 Social Sec Committee. The housing benefit regulations Secretary of State is introducing in April tremendous difficulties and inexorably increase of local authority administration. I cite the exp 1983 with the administrative shift from DHSS authority payment of housing payment. T regarded as a minor tidying-up operation which supported, but it caused great difficulty. In my extra demands on housing departments and the information and expertise required to admin system efficiently have not been properly ta account in the orders before us.

In all honesty, I also do not think that provision has been made for the on-costs and a expenditure required for implementation of the ity charge. I do not believe that £12 million ne enough. COSLA believes that the Governm underestimated the cost by about 50 per cent proves to be true, will adjustments be made in t of the financial year? I believe that there is a rea that the Government are rushing this fence. It complicated piece of legislation. Much work rema done and many regulations have not yet been pu consultation. I fear that there will be a good administrative chaos anyway, but my question simply this. If, as the Government monitor the s it becomes clear that the £12 million is a su underestimate, is there any machinery for taking of that in the course of the year and, if so, will the use it?

Considering the orders against the backgroun financial situation of local government, I believe Government could have done better. I agree with Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) figures are a marginal improvement on what h before. My local authority in south-east Scotlan great complaint other than those that I have ment passing today. Nevertheless, I believe that the Gov have paid a very high price and I am pleased that these are to be the last orders. I hope that in the future the Government will organise the system better, although I suspect that that is a vain hope, and at least improve the relationship between central and local government when the community charge system is introduced.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I am — [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am delighted that I still have my fans on the Opposition Benches.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), who spoke on behalf of the Liberals, must be one of the world's supreme optimists as his chances of ever occupying the Treasury Bench must be as slender as those of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton). I was surprised that he should make such comments today when the nice people of politics have been seen for what they are. Like the rest of us, they fall out and have disagreements. It must also have been discouraging for the hon. Gentleman to discover that his friends the Social Democrats have not even come along to hear what he has to say, although there were two Liberals here to support him.

The hon. Member for Cathcart made a fascinating comment towards the end of his speech. He will no doubt correct me if I am wrong, but he seemed to be saying in effect that, so long as there is a Scottish Office and the votes of the Scottish people do not support the party in power in the unitary Parliament of the time, there is a requirement for a Scottish assembly. What does the hon. Member for Cathcart think would happen if a Labour Government came to power? Does he mean that there is no need for a Department of the Environment substantially for England and Wales?

Mr. Maxton: Substantially, not entirely.

Mr. Walker: I said "substantially". The hon. Gentleman is going down the road that I had hoped that he would follow.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Order.

Mr. Walker: This relates to the rate support grant order. I did not raise the matter; it was raised by the hon. Member for Cathcart. This is a debate and I am trying to deal with the points raised by the hon. Member for Cathcart.

I trust that the hon. Member for Cathcart will realise that the Scottish Office looks after forestry, which covers substantial areas in England. If I looked at these matters in more detail, I could find other examples. As always, the hon. Member for Cathcart has not done his homework carefully or thoroughly enough.

I now want to consider the comments made by my hon. Friend the Minister. I agree that we must achieve value for money when we consider what happens in local government. In the examinations into value for money, has any attempt been made to consider the method of organising and collecting the community charge? As I understand it, at least two computer firms are offering suitable packages to local government. Has any attempt been made to evaluate those packages? A British company, ICL, is offering a package that has been accepted by a number of Scottish local authorities. I also understand that Tayside region has opted for a package from National Cash Register. Which of those packages provides t value for money and has any attempt been made t them? If so——

Mr. Maxton rose——

Mr. Walker: I will give way to the hon. Gentle a minute.

If we are to have a cost-effective system of col the most cost-effective package should be implem

Mr. Maxton: Do the packages offered by t companies include, as they obviously must if they a packages for computerisation, any information rebate schemes and if so on what basis do they wo Government have failed to offer us any rebate sch

Mr. Walker: I am sure that the hon. Gentlema expert at writing software for computer companies will know that if the software structure is or correctly in the first place, the level of rebate can b fed in at a different level. I am not an expert i matters, but I know a little about running co systems. Department store groups led this country use of computer systems and stock control was t thing to be computerised. If the hon. Member for C was suggesting that the packages on offer are in so defective, I cannot reply to that. I do not know, as not tried to study them. I am asking the questio giving the answers. However, I would like to whether they will be cost-effective.

I welcome the provisions covering the sports clu any standards, anyone considering the orders would agree with my hon. Friend the Minister th are reasonable settlements in the circumstances, an my hon. Friend the Minister, I hope that this is t time that we will ever debate such orders.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): The Mi speech shows that the Government are turning thei on local services, cleaner streets, and better libraries are restricting improvements in leisure service heralding more council cuts and soaring rates.

The Minister's comments mean that the new p will be even higher than the figures already given Government. The settlement goes nowhere near m the recent pay increases of local government worke the Government are thwarting all attempts to impr cleaning services on our streets which involve sta equipment.

We know that the money is available. The Gover have just spent £130,000-plus. Was it on cleaning streets? No. It was spent on making litter for the It was spent on a leaflet on the poll tax which con so many mistakes that it should have been pulped money should have been spent on local gover services rather than Conservative party propagand

The Government are also turning their bac improvements in our library services. This settleme not fund even current services. The Government brought chaos to local government services. They h home owners with savage cuts in repairs grants month, they cut Edinburgh's 90 per cent. grant from £26 million to £14·5 million. They cut Gla from £32 million to under £15 million. The cut inflic home owners in Scotland in the grant queue was than £29 million, and it was made when local councillors wanted to help to reverse the disrepair experienced by private tenants.

The settlement continues the Government's attack on local government. In 1984, the Conservatives lost control of Edinburgh—and Edinburgh lost £5 million in rate support grant as part of the Government's retribution on the ratepayers and voters of the city for voting in a Labour administration after years of Tory complacency and neglect, which had reduced many of the services in the city to a shambles.

New councillors such as me and other colleagues on these Benches who were elected in Edinburgh and Lothian region were deluged with letters. They were not all from constituents and other ratepayers. They came from Ministers and the Secretary of State himself. He had occasion to write more than once to the committee that I chaired, complaining about the low level of services after he had inflicted cuts.

The same is true of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton), who wrote to me and my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) complaining about the effect of deregulation of the buses—a measure for which he had voted and which inflicted considerable suffering and hardship on his constituents. That, I am afraid, is hypocrisy of the worst order.

Lothian region suffered Government cuts of £80 million between 1980 and 1987, but it was ruled by so-called prudent Tories for four of those seven years. For every year of Conservative rule between 1982 and 1986, the administration of Councillor Brian Meeks could not meet the Government guidelines because they were so draconian.

The Minister invited moderate authorities to look at their budgets again. When Councillor Meeks' Conservative administration looked at its budget again when it was over the guidelines in 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986, it cut services again and again. It robbed senior citizens of their concessionary bus passes. It slashed meals on wheels services to the elderly and disabled. It removed teaching posts, depriving schools of specialist teachers. When Conservative Members represented Edinburgh, they wrote to Councillor Meeks complaining of the cuts of which they were the authors. Those were the effects of rate grant settlements such as this.

We firmly believe that spending on local government is spending wisely. The biggest money-wasters that we have seen in the time of the present Government, and of Governments after 1979, have been Government Departments. Their excesses have been criticised, year in year out, by the Public Accounts Committee; and the officers whom they have appointed to quangos—there are many within the patronage of the Secretary of State and his Ministers—have, in many cases, discharged their duties appallingly.

Why does not the Secretary of State turn his attention to those Departments? [Interruption.] I am asked to name them. I shall name one of many: Lothian health board, which has reduced the Health Service in Edinburgh to a state of chaos and a shambles. For the first time in Scotland, we have seen strikes not just by ancillary workers, but by nurses—who are members of royal colleges, brought out on the streets by the mishandling of the situation by the current Minister of should resign forthwith, and by appoi Secretary of State, who in many instances good members of the health board. [Inter hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) c he challenged me to name some of th concerned. The hon. Gentleman has had wasted the time of the House when he challenged me to name some of the abuses Government and some of the waste for w responsible, and I have given one example.

I want to draw my remarks to a conclu many of my colleagues want to give exampl authorities. I have revealed the hypoc Government, whose Ministers have first infli government cuts of the worst order, and th the councillors complaining about the effect I hope that the Secretary of State wil explanation.

The problem with Conservative Members like to dish it out to the weak in society, but c it. The reason that I am not still in the council the privilege to represent for seven years is th government Minister made such a shambles local government that the constituents whom the honour to represent threw him out. The rate support grant order will pen government, which will have to take the blame of the decisions for which the Secretary of Sta hon. Friends are responsible. Local councils i have had enough. I predict that more Labour c than ever before will be returned for Edinbur and that that result will be reflected throughout It will be due to the caring policies of Labour c in Edinburgh and elsewhere. They have defend against the onslaught of the Secretary of State, who knows that this settlement is not enough to fund adequate local spending. He is not prepared to allow local councillors to decide for themselves, in consultation with the ratepayers.

The artificial limits that have been imposed on the rate support grant settlement will rebound on the Secretary of State in May when the Conservatives will lose even more seats than they lost at the general election.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): The hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths) must be a very worried man if he has to start his election campaign so soon in an effort to try to win a few seats in Edinburgh. The trouble is that he has the misfortune to belong to a party that has no idea about local government finance.

The hon. Gentleman has shouted the odds tonight about cuts in local government expenditure and cuts in the National Health Service. That shows how far he is removed from reality. Everybody knows that far more money is being spent on local government and the National Health Service than ever before. The cuts to which the hon. Gentleman referred are fanciful cuts in mythical budgets put forward by authorities that are prepared to spend unlimited amounts of other people's money on satisfying their own egos.

The hon. Gentleman knows that an immense amount of money is being spent on the National Health Service in Scotland and that there are far more nurses, doctors, dentists and specialists than ever before, but he has had the cheek to say that the National Health Service is in a state of chaos. That is not so. When he replies to the debate, I know that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will take the opportunity to support what I have said. Not for the first time, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South is completely out of his depth.

I welcome the orders. They mean an increase of £338 million in rate support grant, or 9 per cent. That figure includes £170 million of additional money over and above what was provided for in the public expenditure White Paper. That is good news for Scotland. Opposition Members should be welcoming it rather than girning away in their usual fashion whenever we debate Scottish affairs. That substantial increase in the amount of money that is being provided for local government will allow current expenditure to increase. It will also allow resources to be made available for pay increases to the police, the firemen and the teachers. There is no question of cuts being made. After a long haul, there has been success in regard to support for sports clubs. In a Labour Government Finance Bill in 1968 I first proposed that rate relief should be mandatory rather than discretionary for sports clubs. That was opposed by the Labour Government. I am glad that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has now introduced the measure and has allowed for new money in this rate support grant to help sports clubs, as I am sure is the unanimous view of everybody in the House tonight.

When we considered the Rating and Valuation (Amendment) (Scotland) Bill, we looked in depth at the amazing anomalies between major stadia and more humble sports facilities. The anomaly on valuation between Scotland and England is still quite excessive. I hope that this is not the end of the matter. The procedures laid down under that Act have worked to an extent for some of our major football grounds, such as Ibrox and Tynecastle, and so on, but are not as successful as those who drafted that Bill hoped in the original the legislation.

I am pleased, too, that in the Dumfries and region, with the two district councils within represent—Annandale and Eskdale, and Nithsd guidelines now meet assessed needs. That ha request by those local authorities for many years, glad that my right hon. and learned Friend has able to meet it. The region has had an increase cent., or £9·5 million, and a needs element incre per cent., or £2 million, yet having achie satisfactory result, it wishes to put up the rates 20 per cent. That is incomprehensible. There is to blame the Government or for the region to sa achieved what it wants, that it must now raise ex because of the increased availability of resources Government.

The districts have been well looked after by hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. into account not only the rate support grant housing support through the housing revenue acc non-HRA orders, they have been favourably tre year, as they were last year. Their criticisms o resources have been removed. As Opposition would say, all local authorities are keen to h resources, but there are limits in the world of housekeeping because of the priority of keepi inflation. If we were to let local authorities h blanche to spend what they liked, we should be i of rising inflation and unemployment, two i things that we do not want.

Opposition Members tend to forget some statements about local government finance last s the time of the general election. They said that keen to return to the old discredited system of their manifesto, they said that a property tax advantages" and that they wanted a "wide exp resources". So Opposition Members want mo ployment, more inflation and more taxation. Th begin to understand the repercussions of some policies—

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): Will Gentleman give way?

Sir Hector Monro: I shall give way if I wish The hon. Gentleman must sit down and wait.

The Opposition also said that they wished agricultural land and buildings, which would be farmers who are going through a difficult transiti under the common agricultural policy.

Dr. Reid: As the hon. Gentleman is so op increases in taxation, does he agree with the fig have been produced by the Library that show tha figures, far from being £250 per head, the poll t the Government continue the cuts of the past few funding local authorities and hold the business ra as they have said they will, be £450 for every man and adult over 18 years of age? Is an average fami to pay a poll tax of £2,000 per annum Gentleman's idea of a cut in taxation?

Sir Hector Monro: I do not accept t Gentleman's figures. I have looked carefully at th and at answers to parliamentary questions, combined community charge and water rate will be £190. For the average couple, and particularly for the widow or single person, living in reasonable accommodation, it will be a great advantage. I do not want to start an argument on the community charge at this time of night, but the hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) will find that it is a much fairer tax than any of the proposals that I have quoted from the Labour party manifesto, which were a rating disaster in terms of political advancement.

[Sir Hector Monro]

Labour Members should be grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the rate support grant that he has put forward. It should be warmly welcomed by all local authorities.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): It has been claimed this year, and many a year before, that COSLA and Scottish local authorities are grateful for and pleased with the year's rate support grant. That has always sounded like a battered wife being pleased because her husband is battering her no more this year than he did last year.

The accusation about overspending is particularly unjust, and it carries no evidence with regard to Scottish local authorities. It is particularly amusing because it has been made at a time when we have been reading about Westminster city council, which has sold three cemeteries —one for a mere £1 to a developer, who promptly sold it to another developer for millions of pounds. Relatives who have been visiting the graves of their families for more than 50 years have complained that those well-kept cemeteries have now become wastelands. There is not one Scottish local authority that would dream of conducting itself in such a manner. With such activities going on, it is amazing that Conservative Members dare to talk about the wastefulness of Scottish local authorities.

The Government show no sign of answering the points that have been made during the debate by Labour Members. The hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) claimed that new money was being made available for sports clubs. The COSLA document has pointed out—I am sure that Ministers must have read it — that the overall grant percentage has been maintained in line with this year's figure, so the compensation to authorities for grant relief is not new money. It has been earmarked and transferred from sums that would otherwise have been available for general needs grant.

The hon. Member for Dumfries claims to understand local government finance. He had a go at Labour Members and said that they know nothing about it. I imagine that the hon. Gentleman realies on the forelock-tugging peasantry in his locality putting faith in his understanding of local government finance. The reality is that very few people do understand it. The Government hope that, because of the widespread lack of understanding of it, they will get away with their schemes.

It has been said that for about half the population of Scotland the increase will be only 3 per cent. on this year's budgeted level. As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) observed, pay and price increases have been about twice as much as that. The Minister's response was to argue that wages are within the direct control of local authorities. That makes me wonder whether the Minister knows anything about wage bargaining in the local authority sect including manual workers, those in the professionals. Surely the Minister know takes place at an all-Britain level with re all the local authorities in the ma Following the bargaining there is all-Bri that which has been negotiated. There decisions on what pay levels will be. suggesting that there should be a mov national negotiating machinery? If he take that view, they should say so plainly to the people that that is what they are of Ministers came out with the suggesti I am sure that Scottish local authorities whether the same suggestion is being ma Office.

In addition to the pay and price incr final stage of the teachers' pay award and benefit arrangements that will come int There are many pressures on local gover that just for once my colleagues and I wi to our questions.

The majority do not have a grasp of of local government finance. That being the Government Benches hope to get chicanery. However, the public know w being cut. They know when streets are when bins are being emptied less often cannot have home helps. They know wh and they know who they will be voting f general election.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): I s because there is a shortage of things to I realise that the debate will shortly be br

There has been a clear difference betw of Opposition Members, such as the ho Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) and for E (Mr. Griffiths), and those of Conservativ speeches of Conservative Members have unreality and we have heard reality f Members who have served in local govern reality of several rate support grant order local government. I know that local basically underfunded for the task Government place upon it. Central G stantly place more tasks on local gove providing it with adequate finance. They that by hedging in local government by m guidelines.

Needs allowances are unrelated to t people of Scotland, and that is allied to support grant settlements. There is a deli shifting the funding of local government, i support grant, from central Government the shoulders of ratepayers. All lo throughout Scotland, even Conservative- that are supposedly prudent, have beer complaints to the Government about the they have received while attempting to pro those who elected them.

I wish to dispel the myth of high authorities. I should be interested to contradict the COSLA critique, which de local government tries to give value for in a professional way throughout Scotland to provide high-quality services at reasonable costs. If the Government want local authorities to provide services, they must realise that that cannot be done on the cheap. Angus district council, for example, had its needs allowance halved in one year. Such violent swings in the supply of central Government finance are obviously harmful and make it difficult for local authorities to operate. It is only central Government's estimates of local needs that change, not the needs themselves.

Paragraph 4 of appendix F of the order shows that the so-called overspend of £122 million resulted in a clawback of £202 million. That cannot be regarded as anything but a punishment, and that it unfair to those who use local government services.

I ask the Government to explain the £12 million allocation for the collection of poll tax payments. Angus district council estimates that there will be £300,000 in capital costs and £360,000 in revenue costs. That is one district — what about the other 52? Tayside region estimates that £4 million will be required for accommodation for people working on the poll tax. How can that equate with the £12 million offered? If the sum is inadequate, will the Government give extra cash to meet these needs and consult COSLA?

Mr. Lang: It would be overstating it to say that this has been a productive debate. It has at least been interesting and somewhat predictable. There was a good deal of indignation, most of it plainly synthetic in view of the generous settlement.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) referred to cuts in the rate support grant percentage. If he really wants to look at cuts in the RSG percentage, he should look back to the period of the last Labour Government, who reduced the RSG percentage from 75 per cent. to 68·5 per cent., which in one fell swoop reduced it by 4 per cent. more than this Government have ever reduced it by. As for the argument that by keeping the RSG percentage constant it might somehow lead to more stable local government expenditure, over the four-year period when we left it at 68·5 per cent. local government expenditure rose by no less than 60 per cent.

The hon. Member for Cathcart suggested that consultation with COSLA was a sham and that it wants a much more generous settlement. COSLA wanted £3,679 million and got £3,637·53 million. Indeed, the only difference between ourselves and COSLA was over the estimate of the local government inflation rate. All the details of the grant distribution—the domestic element, the ratio of needs to resources, the use of the client group method, the minimum grant increase, the grant percentage —were precisely what COSLA asked for.

The hon. Member for Cathcart said that some authorities would get only a 3 per cent. increase in their guideline, and COSLA pointed out that that was about half the population. As the total increase is 5·2 per cent. over budget, it is therefore demonstrable that the other half of the population would get a considerably larger increase. Authorities such as Strathclyde and Lothian have a 3 per cent. increase in their guideline. Spending levels were some £15 million over assessed need in Strathclyde and £16 million over assessed need in Lothian. As for the 4 per cent. increase in provision for 1988-89 including some £12 million for the community charge introduction, the hon. Member for Cathcart is plain wron listened to me, he would have been aware million is in addition to the 4 per cent. incre

PETITIONS

Abortion (Amendment) Bill

12.8 am

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): I beg to ask leave to present a petition to the House. It is signed by 420 of my constituents and says that the Abortion (Amendment) Bill, which proposes to reduce the upper limit for abortions, will, if enacted, restrict women's choices, endanger their health and open the door to further attacks on the Abortion Act 1967.

I present this petition to the House as an expression of a small minority view in my constituency, but the people who express it are entitled to have me present their petition.

I have a second petition which I present on behalf of 480 people in the constituency of Harrow, East, and I do so on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes). It is in the same words and to the same effect as the petition from the people of Harrow, West.

To lie upon the Table.

Ozone Layer

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

12.10 am

Mr. Hugo Summerson (Walthamstow): Without the sun there would be no life on earth, but the sun is an enemy as well as a friend. It emits ultra-violet radiation which would be very dangerous to all life. Fortunately, we have a defence in the ozone layer.

What is ozone? To give it its technical description, it is a blue gaseous allotrope of oxygen derived or formed naturally from diatomic oxygen by electric discharge or exposure to ultra-violet radiation. The ozone layer occurs in a region of atmosphere between 15 and 30 km high. There is not a great deal of it; if it were all gathered in one layer at ground level it would be about the thickness of a £1 coin.

How is the ozone layer formed, and what does it do? Ultra-violet light, which has a very short wave length and is emitted from the sun, splits the oxygen molecules into two atoms and forms ozone by reaction. Thus, in a beautiful natural interaction the sun provides the earth with a defence against its own ultra-violet radiation as the ozone layer absorbs that radiation, stopping it reaching the ground. Now this crucial defence is being eroded and dissolved. Over Antarctica it is shattered. What on earth is happening?

The British Antarctic Survey has studied the ozone layer since 1957. In 1982 it noticed strange depletions in the layer over Antarctica. Before then, observed and predicted changes were less than 1 per cent. per decade. Now the ozone content has more than halved in a period of 30 to 40 days each year. It is down to the thickness of a penny.

This is happening particularly over Antarctica because of a phenomenon called the polar vortex. The combined effects of extreme cold at −80 deg C and strong westerly winds ensure that the air over Antarctica remains isolated from the mid-latitude air, which is relatively rich in ozone. In spring, with the dying down of the vortex, the level of ozone should recover. It has done in the past, but now it does not, and ozone is most depleted where there should be most of it.

Why is the ozone disappearing? Theories based on the solar cycle and on a mechanism of upwelling air are no longer tenable. An enormous experiment, the airborne Antarctic ozone experiment, was carried out last year between 19 August and 30 September by the National Aeronautical and Space Administration in conjunction with the United States National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the National Science Foundation and the Chemical Manufacturers Association, joined by the British Meteorological Office.

The powerful experiment showed that the abundance of chlorine monoxide—I shall come to its sources—at 18 km was sufficient to account for the observed rate of decrease of ozone. Within the polar vortex the amount of hydrochloric acid was very low, which led the scientists to believe that the release of chlorine from hydrochloric acid must play a major part in the story of the ozone hole. The scientists also obtained some evidence to support the view that the release of chlorine occurs from particles in the polar stratosphere.

[Mr. Hugo Summerson]

What is causing the destruction of the ozone layer? There are natural causes, but there has always been a balance between the rate of destruction and the rate of renewal. The ozone layer cannot cope with the man-made gases, chlorofluorocarbons, or CFCs, which were invented in 1928 and have proved extremely useful. They are relatively non-toxic, non-flammable and stable. They are used as propellants in aerosols, in refrigerators and air-conditioning systems, in the dry cleaning industry, foam-blowing processes, for such things as fast food packaging, fire-fighting, home insulation and as solvents in the micro-electronics industry.

The CFCs, after use, escape into the stratosphere, where they are decomposed by sunlight to free chlorine, which destroys ozone. Unfortunately, CFCs have a very long life; they can last for more than 100 years. This means that an 85 per cent. cut in CFCs is needed immediately just to stabilise concentrations at today's levels. In 1986 global production of CFCs was about 750,000 tonnes.

What would be the consequences if the ozone layer were destroyed? The Fat Boy in "Pickwick Papers" said:

"I wants to make your flesh creep."

No, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I do not want to make your flesh creep, nor do I want to make your flesh ulcerate. Malignant melanoma skin cancers, corneal tumours on the eyes and acute photokeratitis are just some of the effects of undiluted solar ultra-violet radiation.

Beautiful bronzed bodies lying on the beach will be a thing of the past. We need not think that because we do not get as much sun as, for example, Australia and New Zealand, where skin cancers are already on the increase, we will not suffer as badly. Clouds do not stop ultra-violet radiation. Ozone depletion also has appalling consequences for plants and, therefore, agriculture. Effects include decreased photosynthesis and yield and changes in flowering patterns. Field research on soya beans, for instance, shows a 25 per cent. decrease in yield as a result of exposure to a comparable increase in ultra-violet radiation.

Concern about damage to the ozone layer is relatively new. It first arose in 1974, following publication of a paper on the subject by two American academics, Rowland and Molina. That concern led to increased international research into the effects of CFCs on the ozone layer and to precautionary action in many countries. In 1977 the United Nations environment programme set up the co-ordinating committee on the ozone layer. This was followed by the Vienna convention on the protection of the ozone layer, adopted in 1985. The United Kingdom signed it in May 1985 and ratified it in May 1987. Before then, different measures were taken in different countries. The United States banned all non-essential uses of CFCs in aerosols, but did not control other uses of CFCs, which continued to grow, particularly in foam, plastics and solvent cleaning. Canada and the Nordic countries did much the same, but the EEC, in decisions in 1980 and 1982, sought to limit CFC production while reducing CFC uses, particularly in aerosols, with a reduction of 30 per cent. by the end of 1981.

However, it was clear that international measures were the best way forward. Negotiations on a protocol to the Vienna convention began in December 1986 and were concluded on 16 September 1987, with the adoption of the Montreal protocol on substances that deplete the ozone layer. This was signed by the United Kingdom, the EEC, the United States of America, Japan and 23 other countries and should come into force on 1 January 1989. It provides for control of emissions of the five most dangerous types of CFCs in three stages: first, a freeze on consumption, calculated at 1986 levels, 18 months after the protocol comes into force; secondly, a 20 per cent. reduction by the year ending 30 June 1994; and, thirdly, a further 30 per cent. reduction by the year ending 30 June 1999. Thus there will be a total reduction of 50 per cent. by the year 2000. However, the protocol allows for the corresponding production figures to be 10 per cent. higher in the first two stages and 15 per cent. at the third to give industry the room to rationalise and to ensure continuing supplies for developing countries which are party to the protocol to meet their basic domestic needs.

These measures are subject to review at least every four years, beginning in 1990 in the light of new information. There are special provisions to help countries which produce small amounts of CFCs to rationalise and to allow countries with extra production already planned to take that into account, subject to limitations on their base year figures. EEC countries can fulfil their obligations jointly. There are provisions limiting trade with countries which are not party to the protocol and giving developing countries more time to comply. But these provisions are designed to encourage more countries to join the protocol.

Whether or not these provisions are satisfactory, it is at least a sign that many countries are concerned, to a large or small extent, about the damage to the ozone layer. Views differed about what was necessary as at that time there were scientific uncertainties about the extent of the damage and the speed with which alternatives to CFCs could be developed and brought into use.

Since the NASA experiment which, unfortunately, finished after the Montreal protocol had been signed, scientific opinion is now much clearer on the damage that has been done and is being done. A hole the size of the United States in the ozone layer over the Antarctic is the clearest possible warning that we are overburdening the atmosphere. I believe that the measures taken in the protocol—and I pay tribute to those responsible for it—are not sufficient to protect the ozone layer. The parties to the protocol can agree to amend it, if there is new evidence pointing to the need for more stringent measures. We now have that new evidence and we need those more stringent measures with great urgency.

It is no good procrastinating and saying "Oh dear, the ozone layer has gone. Now we had better do something." If we lock the stable door after the horse has bolted, we can always get another horse, but to replace part of the atmosphere is a different matter altogether. It will be most interesting to see what results come from the joint French, West German and American expedition to the Arctic to check the position there.

What is to be done? I should like to set out a six-point programme. First, in the light of new knowledge, the parties to the Montreal protocol should meet as soon as possible to reconsider and toughen its provisions. Secondly, as there is still an enormous amount to be learnt about the atmosphere and the ozone layer, we need more and urgent research, more theory, more modelling and more use of super-computers. The Stratospheric Ozone Review Group set up by the Department of the Environment which published its first report in August 1987 is due to report again later this year, but there must be better co-ordination between the various groups studying the atmosphere and I call for a national institute for atmospheric studies to be established.

Thirdly, all aerosol cans must be labelled. This is already happening with those cans which do not produce CFCs as propellants being labelled "Ozone Friendly", but the labelling should be mandatory. Meantime, one can get from Friends of the Earth a list of products which do not use CFCs as propellants.

Fourthly, all non-essential uses of CFCs must be eliminated as soon as possible. I am glad to see that ICI and ISC Chemicals have recently announced their participation, with 11 other companies, in a programme to develop suitable alternatives to CFCs. This work must be pushed on. Meantime, essential and non-essential uses should be strictly defined. We cannot risk the future of the earth for the sake of deodorants and fast food cartons. Having said that, I congratulate those companies which have stopped using CFCs in their packaging and aerosols.

Fifthly, we need a rigorous British standard for mobile air-conditioning plants in vehicles. These plants use CFCs as coolants and tend to leak.

Finally, there is a substance even more devastating than chlorine in the damage that it causes to ozone. Bromine is being used more and more in fire extinguishers which, at the urging of insurance companies, are tested at frequent intervals. A substitute for bromine must be found urgently, and it would help if some other means of testing fire extinguishers were used.

We have our warning and our opportunity and we must not miss it because it may be the last we have.

12.24 am

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Summerson) for allowing me to intervene briefly in his Adjournment debate. I wonder whether he and my hon. Friend the Minister would agree that recent moves by manufacturers of chlorofluorocarbons, not least ISC in my constituency, should be encouraged.

Manufacturers have pressed for the recent protocols, including the Montreal protocol to which my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow referred, as a breathing space to enable them to develop other chemicals — principally the halogenated chlorofluorocarbons—which in the long term will replace the chlorofluorocarbons currently used in the world market. This will enable ISC and ICI, the two principal United Kingdom companies in this market, to provide the same benefits to the consumer while avoiding the potential detriment to the environment represented by chlorofluorocarbons.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will encourage those companies to continue that necessary work to fill a gap in the market.

12.26 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Colin Moynihan): I will reply first to the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern). I fully recognise and support the important work being undertaken not only by the company in his constituency but by ICI and other international companies in researching and developing alternatives. That initiative is critical to the success of the work initiated in international forums.

I thank my hon. Friend for intervening at this late hour to place on record his well-known and deeply appreciated concern about this important issue. Perhaps I may, through him, also thank the company to which he has referred and the 10 other companies involved for their support, which is essential in identifying alternatives and in persuading consumers to change their pattern of consumption of goods containing not just halons but chlorofluorocarbons. The work being undertaken is well worthy of praise and a first step along a road that we wish to encourage further.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Summerson) raised this important subject in a powerful maiden Adjournment speech and I congratulate him on his extremely useful contribution. It is not an easy subject and to have mastered it so early in a parliamentary career which I know will include great progress in the future is worthy of congratulation from both sides of the House. I am grateful to him.

The potential threat to the ozone layer is a major environmental issue of concern not just to the people of this country but to everyone on the planet, and rightly so. The ozone layer screens us all from harmful ultra-violet radiation from the sun and the consequences of significant global depletion would be very serious for human life as well as for animals and plants.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow drew particular attention to the so-called Antarctic hole. The discovery of large depletions in the ozone layer over the Antarctic has focused attention even more sharply and has led to a great deal of international activity in which United Kingdom scientists have participated. Indeed the hole was discovered by Dr. Farman and colleagues at the British Antarctic Survey. The hole appears for some two months during the Antarctic spring and then recovers, but during 1987, as my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow said, it was clearly deeper and lasted longer than in previous years, and that must be a matter of concern for scientists throughout the world and to politicians.

There are many theories about the causes of the phenomenon. The initial findings of the major international scientific study of last autumn, in which the Meteorological Office collaborated closely, strongly suggest the involvement of chlorofluorocarbons, or CFCs as they are generally known. However, it is not quite as simple as that. The hole appears to be the result of a complex interaction of both chemical and meteorological processes. The key question is whether it is a localised phenomenon, unique to Antarctica, or whether there are global implications. In their initial findings the scientists leading the study have refused to rush into print. They emphasise that it is premature to speculate on the global implications until the causes of the hole are better understood. The results of the study are now being analysed, with the aim of publishing them after peer-reviewing in May.

Far from ignoring the problems, as some ill-informed critics have suggested, the British Government very much share the concern about the ozone layer. We have been closely involved in the measures that have already been taken to protect it. As long ago as 1980 the United Kingdom and other European Community member states took precautionary action when they agreed measures to control emissions of the two most widely used CFCs. Those are chemicals with the potential to destroy the ozone layer. They are widely used as propellants in aerosol cans, in the manufacture of foam plastics, in refrigeration, air-conditioning and as solvents. The Community decided to limit overall production of CFCs 11 and 12 by placing a ceiling on production capacity. That was supplemented by a reduction in their use in aerosols by 30 per cent. and co-operation in reducing emissions from other uses. In the United Kingdom those requirements have been achieved by voluntary agreements with industry.

While Economic Community action concentrated mainly on overall production, a different approach was adopted by the United States. Far from banning CFCs outright, as is often claimed, the United States simply banned non-essential use of CFCs in aerosols. That left growth in other uses quite unconstrained. As the Americans have acknowledged, growth in other sectors, in particular rigid foam, has completely offset the effect of reductions in aerosol use. As a result, per capita consumption of CFCs in the United States remains as high as it is in the Economic Community.

Because the threat to the ozone layer is a global problem, I emphasise that it needs a global solution. The United Kingdom has been fully involved in wider international action. First, in 1985 the United Kingdom signed the Vienna convention for the protection of the ozone layer. We were the first Economic Community country to ratify it in May last year. That framework convention, which will come into force later this year, covers such important matters as co-operation in monitoring research and information exchange.

Secondly, as my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow rightly stated, on 16 September last year in Montreal the United Kingdom and the European Community signed a protocol to the Vienna convention, along with the United States, Japan and 21 other countries. The protocol represents international commitment to control global emissions of not only CFCs but halons, which are chemicals used in fire extinguishers.

Although it may be unconventional and not customary in the House, it would be right of me to pay tribute to the work carried out by Fiona McConnell and her team at the Department of the Environment who did so much excellent work to ensure that the protocol was successful with a major British input and a major British lead. When I describe their work as having "commitment" and "sensitivity", that is no understatement. Those words are accurate and I use them to pay tribute to the work that the team undertook. If it is possible to distance myself for a minute from officials, it is a pleasure for me to state that if I was not at the Dispatch Box now, but sitting on the Back Benches, I would have equal commitment to the strength of the dedication and excellent work of the team to ensure that my hon. Friends the Members for Walthamstow and for Bristol, North-West were so well informed.

It does not matter to the ozone layer where chemicals such as CFCs come from. The Montreal protocol focuses on controlling overall emissions, not specific uses. That is clear endorsement by the international community of the need to tackle the totality of emissions rather than banning particular uses, which has been shown to be inefficient and ineffective.

The protocol provides for CFC consumption to be halved in three stages by the end of the century. First, it will be frozen in 1990 at 1986 levels. Secondly, it will be cut by 20 per cent. in 1994. Thirdly, there will be a fur 30 per cent. reduction in 1999. In addition, consumption of the halons will be frozen at 1986 level 1992. The protocol also allows the possibility of indivic parties' production to run at a slightly higher level t their consumption. The purpose of that provision has b misunderstood. It is solely for the purpose of giv industry the flexibility to rationalise and to ens continuing supplies for developing countries which parties to meet their basic domestic needs.

We are anxious that participation in the proto should be as wide as possible. It was to encourage this negotiators in Montreal agreed generous treatment low-consuming developing countries by allowing th extra time before they impose controls. For the sa reason, imports from countries not party to the proto will be banned.

I pay tribute to the important role played by European Commission, which was mandated to negot on behalf of the Community. The United Kingdom also actively involved in the negotiations in strong supp of the Commission. I believe that the Montreal proto is a major environmental achievement. It is the international measure designed to prevent rather than c a global environmental problem. Everyone agreed that could not afford to wait for positive proof of global oz depletion.

Inevitably, there were differences on how far and h fast it was necessary and reasonable to go, given scientific uncertainties about the extent to which the oz layer might be depleted, the availability of alternatives CFCs and the speed with which new substances technologies could be developed. I have no doubt that 50 per cent. cut in consumption is the highest on whic would have been possible to reach consensus, and country sought a higher figure in the final round negotiations in Montreal.

In my view, we have achieved a good environmen balance for taking prudent, anticipatory action wh gives both producers and users of these extremely use chemicals time to adjust. Industry has been given a cl signal of the need to develop alternatives to meet timetable agreed by the international community. I mi add that the United States sought a 20 per cent. incre in production at the first stage to benefit the industry, the European Community resisted that move environmental grounds and it was reduced to 10 per ce

The crucial question, of course, is whether the proto will do the job. Are the measures sufficient to safegu the health and welfare of future generations? Clearly, th are uncertainties. How many countries will join protocol? Will the Soviet Union sign up? How mu growth will there be in developing countries' consum tion? What can be done to prevent non-parties fr producing CFCs and halons? Nevertheless, Government's view is that on the basis of current scient understanding, the prudential measures in the protocol adequate to prevent significant depletion in the glo ozone layer. However—this is most important—if n evidence points to the need for more stringent glo measures, the protocol can be amended.

It is important that the evidence suggested by my h Friend the Member for Walthamstow should be given significant review. I am sure that that will be the ca

There are clear provisions for the measures to be reviewed every four years, but that does not negate the possibility of new scientific data being reviewed at any stage.

I hope that what I have said assists my hon. Friend and convinces him that the Government take the threat to the ozone layer seriously. We have played an active part in measures that have been taken to protect it, and we continue to keep the situation closely under review. If there are major new developments, further global action must and will be taken. I give that commitment. The agreement is remarkable for allowing enough flexibility for such a commitment to be given when there is a major development in the international scientific community concerning the impact on the ozone layer of a variety of chemicals on the market.

I hope that I have helped my hon. Friends. I am grateful to them for raising this matter and I am sure that the House is indebted to them for the time that they have spent researching it and offering their wise counsel.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Education Reform

1. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received concerning clauses 82 to 113 of the Education Reform Bill, relating to further and higher education, as they affect Scotland.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Robert Jackson): Of those mentioned, only clauses 92 and 94, which deal with the new Universities Funding Council, extend to Scotland. We have received a number of representations about these provisions, though none specifically on their effect in Scotland.

Mr. Wallace: I am sure that the Minister is well aware of the distinctive and historic traditions of Scottish universities, not least their diverse courses and four-year honours degree courses. What assurances can he give Scottish universities that the Scottish committee of the UFC will have scope and independence to allow that diversity and historic tradition to continue and that they will not be brought into the role of English universities?

Mr. Jackson: It is good to hear the hon. Gentleman marching towards the sound of gunfire with his colleagues. Let us hope that he does not end up as red meat.

The hon. Gentleman is well aware that the relationship between the Government and the universities is conducted on an arm's length principle through the University Grants Committee, and will be, in future, through the UFC. It will be for those institutions to determine their policy in the organisation of universities in Scotland, as it is throughout the rest of the country.

Mr. Bill Walker: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind that Scots do not take lightly the differences between our universities and those south of the border? We are proud of the four-year courses that we run in Scotland. All the evidence shows that they have been beneficial to those who have undergone the courses. More important, we should like to retain the independence that has existed in the past.

Mr. Jackson: My hon. Friend is perfectly right about the value of Scottish universities. Indeed, three out of eight were rated above average by the UGC during recent research exercises. The Government recognise the special position of Scottish universities and their four-year courses by virtue of the fact that in Scotland one third more is spent per student than in England and Wales.

Mr. Ernie Ross: The Education Reform Bill will have an effect on Scotland. What guarantee can the Minister give with regard to the discussions involving Stirling, Dundee and St. Andrew's? If one of those parties fails to agree on proposals about sharing courses, what will be the effect of the clause on funding and the taking back of funds by the UFC, and will it apply in the new circumstances?

Mr. Jackson: The present position will continue after the Bill is enacted, assuming that it is. There will be an arm's length relationship between the Government and the universities. It is up to the UGC—in future, the UFC—to organise provision, in agreement with the universities.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the Minister explain why Scottish universities have done particularly badly under this Conservative Administration? Why have Scottish universities had a cut in resources of 20 per cent. between 1983 and 1987, while the rest of United Kingdom universities have had an average cut of 12 per cent.? Under the proposed legislation, how will he ensure that Scotland is adequately represented on the university body, and how will he get co-ordination between the UFC and central institutions to ensure that higher education right across Scotland is co-ordinated?

Mr. Jackson: The Government have agreed that there should be a Scottish committee of the UFC, and one of its tasks will be to consider co-ordination with the central institutions. I have always understood that the Labour party was a national party—or at least that it intended to continue to be so. We are pursuing a national policy, as did the Labour party when in government. The UGC applies national criteria evenly and fairly to all university institutions throughout the country.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: How can the Minister reconcile the UGC's statement that universities should recruit 900 new members of staff per year when financial stringencies are forcing them to draw up plans for 2,500 redundancies? What is his response to Sir Alwyn Williams, the principal of Glasgow university, who last weekend spoke about the disinherited generations of the next two decades, the scholars and researchers who, under this Government, and I quote——

Mr. Speaker: Order. No quotations at Question Time.

Mrs. Ewing: Sir Alwyn Williams said that we were heading down the road to mediocrity.

Mr. Jackson: In the past two years the Government have increased expenditure on universities by 18 per cent. We have specifically responded to redundancies by providing £155 million to be spent on restructuring over the next three years.

Nursery Education

2. Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to increase the level of nursery provision; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): None. My right hon. Friend has very recently restated the Government's policy on the education of under-fives in his memorandum on the report of the Education, Science and Arts Committee in the previous Session, which the House will remember was entitled "Achievement in Primary Schools".

Mr. Steinberg: I am sure that the majority of hon. Members appreciate the importance of nursery provision to future education and social development. Is it not deplorable that only 23 per cent. of our children get nursery provision? Will the Minister explain what provision he intends to make, bearing in mind that in 1972 the Prime Minister promised that by 1982 there would be nursery provision for 90 per cent. of our children? Is it not deplorable also that the Government hide behind the record of Labour local authorities that provide nursery provision—[HON. MEMBERS: "Too long".]—Not long enough. The 10 best performers are Labour-controlled local authorities and the worst 10 are Tory-controlled.

Mr. Speaker: I ask for brief questions.

Mr. Dunn: I remind the hon. Gentleman that provision and demand in the nursery sector are discretionary. Nevertheless, most education authorities are gradually increasing provision. At present there are 272,000 children in nursery schools or classes, and that is the highest number ever reached.

University of Wales

3. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received concerning the funding of the University of Wales colleges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: About 500 letters have been received since the middle of last year, concerning principally the rationalisation of provision at Bangor and Cardiff. Apart from additional special allowances made for Welsh medium teaching and for the University Registry, the Welsh colleges are funded on precisely the same basis as all other university institutions in Great Britain.

Mr. Jones: Although there is a general welcome for the establishment of a Welsh committee of the University Funding Council, there is concern that the University of Wales is suffering worse cuts than universities in other parts of the United Kingdom. Will the Minister assure the House that that funding imbalance will be borne in mind when the allocation of resources is made to the University of Wales, bearing in mind the special needs arising from, first, the teaching through the medium of the Welsh language, secondly, the federal nature of universities in Wales and, thirdly, that departments tend to be smaller because of the nature of the colleges?

Mr. Jackson: I have already mentioned the special factors that are taken into account by the UGC in its allocation to Wales. It is the policy of the Government, and indeed of most parties in the House—I know it is not the policy of Plaid Cymru, of which Gentleman is a member—that there should b Kingdom national policy for our univers University of Wales and its constituent colleges in exactly the same way by the UGC as all university institutions in the country. The hon. does no service to the University of Wales by special pleading, especially when the University Institute of Service and Technology, Lampete College of Medicine are rated above the avera

Mr. Win Griffiths: The proposal to close the department at University college, Cardiff has nothing to do with education, but rather with Go cost cutting. Indeed, a report from the Department gave it an extremely good rating.

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Gentlema must u that the Secretary of State fixes the number o required for initial teacher training, but the di among the universities is determined by the UG the paradoxes of the situation is that the Gover accused of taking centralising powers by the ve who constantly press us to intervene to d universities.

School Pupils (Literacy)

4. Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of Education and Science if he will list in the Offici information available to him on those developed that do not test school pupils for literacy at so before the completion of compulsory schooling.

The Secretary of State for Education and Sci Kenneth Baker): All developed countries hav leaving examinations which reflect literacy sk assessment and testing arrangements to be es within the national curriculum will monito language attainments at the key educational sta

Mr. Stern: Does my right hon. Friend agree combination of that answer and the recent publi the report of the Task Group on Assessment an —the TGAT report—shows the spurious natu campaign that is being carried on by the Op parties and the teachers' unions in attacking the of testing, which is recognised throughout the re world as an essential part of the educational pro

Mr. Baker: I am grateful to my hon. Friend support of the TGAT report—Professor Black' — published last week. That report recom assessment and testing at the key ages of 7, 11, 14 Our proposals on testing and assessment were su in that report, and I wish to emphasise the impor tests to determine a child's ability at those ages cannot determine whether a child has literacy sk can decipher a page of writing when he is seven, he to suffer throughout his education.

Mr. Rees: Is it not the case that in other de countries pupils at independent schools are also

Mr. Baker: The right hon. Gentleman will kn the independent schools' courses are very close national curriculum and that those schools usual tests and examinations on a much wider scale envisage for state-maintained schools.

Mr. Dickens: Is it not right that all parents should be able to expect their children at least to be able to read, write and do basic mathematics when they leave school? How can we be sure that teachers are on their toes and that children are making progress towards that end unless we test?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend is right in saying that we want children to be able to do all those things. Let me say a bit more about the subject. Those are the basic skills which represent the core subjects in our national curriculum. It is true that children have to be assessed and tested, which is exactly what the TGAT report says.

Mr. Bernie Grant: Will the Secretary of State tell us what measures he will take to guard against cultural bias in the tests?

Mr. Baker: The Black report refers to these matters. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has seen the ILEA report of research undertaken before Christmas relating to the achievements of black Afro-Caribbean children in London. One thing that was discovered—and this comes as no surprise — is that many of the black Afro-Caribbean children were much more motivated to do well at school than many of the white children. They got lower grades because they lacked basic skills, and that is one of the reasons why we have put basic skills right at the heart of the national curriculum.

Mr. Sackville: Does my right hon. Friend agree that if a child is not achieving basic standards of literacy his parents have a right and a duty to find that out? Politicians and others who would stand in the way of that process do a grave disservice to children, parents and, indeed, the future of the country.

Mr. Baker: The report makes it clear that information about the assessments and tests should be made available to the child concerned—although the results should not be published so as to identify the child—to the teachers and to the child's parents, so that the necessary action can be taken. The right of a parent to know precisely how his or her child is doing is a fundamental necessity of education.

Mr. Fatchett: Given that TGAT, under the chairmanship of Professor Black, casts doubts on the validity of publishing assessment results of children aged seven, will the Secretary of State give a categorical assurance that the Government will not enact legislation to force schools to publish the results of such assessments, or are we to have a totally divisive and competitive system?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman will know from our debates in Committee that we broadly welcome the report, whose proposals are out to consultation. Professor Black's team made the point that there should be assessment and testing at the age of seven. It also said that to publish results as a judgment upon the school would not be entirely fair, and I acknowledge that there is some strength in that argument. However, it is important that the results of the tests and assessments at the age of seven should be made available to parents so that they may know how their child is doing in relation to national standards.

Education Reform

5. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received regarding the national curriculum.

The Minister of State, Department of Educa Science (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): When the Ed Reform Bill received its Second Reading, we had a total of 9,300 letters on our national cur proposals. Since then we have received about 66 from individuals and organisations on the same s

Mr. Yeo: Will my hon. Friend inform the Hous number of representations that have been in favou national curriculum?

Mrs. Rumbold: It is difficult to say how many ha in favour. However, our statistics can point out in which some of the responses were oppose example, we analysed the 1,312 responses organisations on a simple basis and, in principle, were opposed. My hon. Friend will be happy to kn of the 11,790 individual responses, only 1,53 opposed in principle.

Mr. Fisher: Has the Minister had an opportu read the new clause that has been tabled to the Ed Reform Bill, which asks the Government to set up Education Council to promote the arts in educa part of the national curriculum? Is she aware of th concern felt by parents, educationists and artists ab position of the arts in the national curriculum? W look again at the new clause and see it as a const way forward for promoting the arts in the curricu

Mrs. Rumbold: We have not yet had time to co the proposed new clause to which the hon. Gen referred. However, he will know that art and musi part of the foundation curriculum that we are prop

Mr. Pawsey: Does my hon. Friend accept th proposals for the national curriculum will be wel widely by parents, who will see them as having par relevance to the world of work? Does she further that many employers will welcome them becau national curriculum will help to bridge some of th that have shown up in education and caused probl industry when young people have entered busines commerce?

Mrs. Rumbold: I am grateful to my hon. Friend fo question. Many parents are anxious to know how children are doing. The national curriculum will them in that process throughout a child's school ca

Many employers have complained that some young people who have left school at the age of 1 gone straight to work have not covered sufficient su during their education as it stands at present. The na curriculum will go a long way towards remedying situation.

Mr. Hardy: Having grossly underfunded the intr tion of the new general certificate of secondary educ will there be a similar denial of resources to scho accompany the introduction of the national curricu

Mrs. Rumbold: I must advise the hon. Gentlema the GCSE is one of the best resourced examination to be introduced in this country. It was supported continuous basis through its pilot schemes, and wh was first introduced by several millions of pounds, s hon. Gentleman's accusation is unacceptable. national curriculum proposals are being looked at pilot programme.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Are Ministers succeeding in removing the anxieties of religious bodies and individuals, who fear that religious instruction may be squeezed and suffer when the core curriculum is introduced?

Mrs. Rumbold: My hon. Friend knows that we are taking great care to respond to the concern of many people about the place of religious instruction in schools. Therefore, we have taken steps in our national curriculum proposals to strengthen the place of religious education in the school curriculum by strengthening the methods by which parents may have redress if they feel that religious instruction is not taking place as it was intended it should in the Education Act 1944.

6. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many representations he has now received on his proposals for schools to opt out of local education authority control.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received well over 900 written responses to my consultation paper from a wide range of sources, together with a variety of less formal representations.

Mr. Rowe: Does my right hon. Friend agree that a balance must be struck between providing parents with the type of school that they want for their children and the creation of establishments, the outcome of which may well be further fragmentation of society — for example, a Scientology school? Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that he will take account of such dangers in reviewing opted-out schools?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend will know that grant-maintained schools will not initially be allowed to change their character. We intend to table amendments to the Bill to ensure that any proposal to change the religious ethos of a school is equivalent to a significant change in character, and such a change would be subject to full public procedures.

Mr. Flannery: Is the Secretary of State aware that there is deep worry throughout the education community, and well beyond it—among parents—about the opting-out process? Is it not seen by many to be a blow struck at the local education authorities, which have been built up by a process of democracy over 100 years? Is it not an attempt by the Government to introduce private education by the back door?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman knows, because he is a member of the Standing Committee on the Bill and we are just reaching the relevant clauses, that the proposal for grant-maintained schools is designed to increase the choice available to parents. Many parents, I believe, will want to exercise that choice. There is nothing compulsory about it, and if parents and governors wish to come together and persuade the Secretary of State that a school should be grant-maintained, I see no reason why that should not be allowed.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it was a tragic day for education when Mrs. Shirley Williams, then a member of the Labour Government, got rid of direct-grant schools? Will not the opt-out system restore that principle, not only for bright children, but for a wide educational and social range?

Mr. Baker: I think that many issues will be laid at the door of the right hon. Lady, who was one of my predecessors when a member of the Labour Not only did she destroy the direct-grant sch tried to legislate to destroy the grammar stopped that in 1980.

Grant-maintained schools will not analogous to direct-grant schools, but they wider variety and choice for parents. That that we want—for comprehensive, gramma modern, Church and independent schools, city technology colleges and grant-maintain well.

Mr. Ashdown: The Secretary of State wi there is deep concern that, while the decision t be made by a majority of parents voting nevertheless represent a very small minority the school. Will he say how many represent received from his own Back Benches, and wh to do about it?

Mr. Baker: I know that the whole House is bated breath to know exactly what the new L is on these matters. Until the last week or Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. was putting forward a policy in favour of sc in, and he has also said that he wants them to should like to know the answer.

When it comes to the proportion of paren per cent. is indeed a high hurdle. No Governm war have been elected with such a high vote.

Mr. Madel: Is not one of the causes for consider opting out the proposal by a loc authority to close a popular school whose nu been artificially restricted and which has been underfunded by that authority? Although m Friend cannot comment on such proposals unt his desk, can he confirm that he is naturally to such schools?

Mr. Baker: I know what is behind my h question, and I certainly cannot commen However, if popular schools have been underfu measures in the Bill will improve that as well. to have empty desks in popular schools, an enrolment clauses will put paid to that practice many different types of school in man circumstances will want to consider grant status, and my hon. Friend may well have id such circumstance.

Mr. Straw: Will the Secretary of State conf overwhelming majority of the 900 responses received have been opposed to the opting-o and anything like it? Is the weight of oppos proposal the reason why the Secretary of Sta the balloting arrangements, so that a very sm of parents can determine the long-term future

Mr. Baker: A figure of 51 per cent. of tho indeed a very high hurdle in any ballot. Gentleman is saying that our proposals are n he should recall that a Gallup poll last Octob that 1 in 5 parents are interested in opting out. to the most recent poll, that has risen to 1 in

Mr. Haselhurst: Can my right hon. Friend there will be established criteria for opting out, each case will be looked at entirely on its meri a section 12 notice?

Mr. Baker: I envisage each one being looked at on its merits.

Academic Research

8. Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the state of academic research in United Kingdom universities.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The volume and influence of Britain's academic research is second only to that of the United States of America with its vastly larger resources. We are currently reviewing our policies for the science base so as to ensure that this national strength is maintained and enhanced into the 1990s and beyond.

Dr. Thomas: Does the Secretary of State agree that this is unacceptable in view of the role of the University of Wales in the Welsh economy, with Wales getting only 1·8 per cent. of research council spending, although it has 5 per cent. of the population of the United Kingdom? Will he accept that already, to make up for the deficit in research spending in Wales, additional expenditure of at least £20 million is required? Will he address the subject as the Minister responsible for higher education and for the research councils?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman should not be so disparaging about the quality of research in Welsh universities. In the UGC's survey Cardiff was considered to be outstanding in research in mathematics and mechanical engineering. The university nearest to his constituency, Bangor, was above average in oceanography and biomolecular electronics. The amount of research money that is devoted to individual departments depends upon their excellence. The excellent ones will attract more. That is really the whole thrust of the recent change in research funding.

Mr. Summerson: Will my right hon. Friend ensure that there is proper co-ordination between the universities that are doing research into the atmosphere and the ozone layer?

Mr. Baker: Yes. Important work is being done in individual university departments on these matters. The National Environmental Research Council also has programmes in these matters and has to some extent a co-ordinating role in them.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Can the Secretary of State explain why the morale of so many academics who are doing such excellent research is so low? Why do the Government seem only to approve of research only if it confirms their economic and political prejudices? Is it not essential that the Government pay full tribute to all our academics and build up their morale, because successful research is essential for the intellectual development of the nation.

Mr. Baker: I have tried to show my support for British science by securing an increase above the rate of inflation for next year of 6·2 per cent., from £658 million to £699 million. There were three reports on the brain drain last year which all showed that the brain drain had not worsened in 1987. I was glad to see that. By concentrating research in greater centres of excellence, which is a generally agreed policy, I think that we will get better research and more satisfied researchers. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: I ask hon. Members to list questions and the answers. Please let us have questions and answers.

Higher Education

9. Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of Education and Science whether he proposes to changes in the funding of places for part-time s colleges of higher education.

Mr. Jackson: The allocations of recurrent f polytechnics and colleges in 1988-89, announc right hon. Friend on 18 December, provided funding for students enrolled on certain evenin If the Education Reform Bill becomes law in th Session, decisions about the funding of part-tim in polytechnics and colleges in 1989-90 and beyo a matter for the new Polytechnics and Colleges Council.

Mr. Watts: In view of what my hon. Friend about the freedom of the new funding body to appropriate multipliers, why have the existing in multipliers been enshrined in schedule 7 to the E Reform Bill? Does that represent the Gov assessment of an appropriate level of funding?

Mr. Jackson: There has been some misunde of the point. This is a welcome opportunity to clear. The Bill sets up the Polytechnics and Funding Council. It is required, therefore, to s for the entry into the new sector of institutions those are criteria relating to student number computing numbers, the question is how to co time numbers. That is the simple function of sc and it has no other function.

Ms. Armstrong: I had looked for a more hopef from the Minister. Encouraging more people, pa women, back into education demands a fundin that enables them to afford to do it. Will the commit himself to working out ways in which mo adults, particularly women, will be able to ent education?

Mr. Jackson: There was a review last year of students by the National Advisory Body. It is li the new Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Co wish to review the matter. Meanwhile, may I s hon. Lady that the proportion of women in university or higher education rose from 1979 to 1 38 to 42 per cent.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Will the Minister re-exam to part-time students, bearing in mind that over year some people have used their time profitably but that under the new social security regulations likely that they will get grants for study?

Mr. Jackson: The Government attach great im to part-time study, and I shall certainly look at t made by the hon. Gentleman.

Scientific Research

10. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of S Education and Science what are the implicatio policy for scientific research of the concept of c motivated research, adumbrated by Dr. Max Peru and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: We are reviewing our policies for the science base in the light of the Advisory Board for the Research Council's recommendations on strategy and our wide-ranging consultations on those. This includes consideration of what the ABRC, Dr. Perutz and others have said about the need to support curiosity-motivated research.

Mr. Dalyell: Whose side of the argument are Ministers on at this stage; that of Sir David Philips, or that of Dr. Perutz?

Mr. Jackson: The Government are still listening to the various voices speaking on the matter. We are considering proposals made by the ABRC, and extensive representations made by numbers of other people. We have not yet reached any conclusions in the matter.

Mr. Rhodes James: Is my hon. Friend aware that what principally concerns my eminent constituent Dr. Perutz is the ludicrous concept put forward by the ABRC of three tiers of universities, the last of which would have no research at all? Is my hon. Friend aware that a university without research is a contradiction in terms, and can he categorically state that Her Majesty's Government will have nothing whatever to do with this nonsense and will reject this advice?

Mr. Jackson: There is no doubt about the importance of the ABRC's advice that there is a need for continuing selectivity and concentration in our research effort. On the particular way of approaching that, for example by way of a multi-tier structure of universities, that is a question of the means of approaching the objective of selectivity. The Government are of course considering the proposal, but it does not necessarily follow that that is the appropriate way of doing it.

Dr. Michael Clark: Does my hon. Friend agree that all good scientific research is based on curiosity and that the vast majority of scientists are motivated? Therefore, if he continues to support the science base, as he has indicated he will, will he concede that he will, therefore, by definition, be supporting curiosity-motivated research?

Mr. Jackson: There is a requirement for curiosity-based research. Fundamental research is, as it were, the header tank that feeds applied research. That is why the Government support basic research, for example by a 6·2 per cent. increase in research council funding this year.

Mr. Fatchett: While the Minister argues for selectivity in research, has he concluded that there will be universities without research activities and functions, and if he has come to that conclusion, does he find that acceptable for any of our universities?

Mr. Jackson: The Government have reached no conclusions in the matter. The principle of the necessary presence of research in university institutions is one that the Government understand, although I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that more than half the students in higher education in this country are educated in institutions whose mission does not embrace basic research.

Education Reform

11. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secreta Education and Science what represen received from Leicestershire concerning Reform Bill.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Department has re representations from organisations Leicestershire, and many others from in pondents. All representations, except individuals, have been placed in the Libra

Mr. Janner: Is it not right that the representations made from the county o including the representation of the controlled Leicestershire county council, and vigorously against most of the reco the Bill? Is the Bill not regarded by mo county as divisive, removing or reducing l doing nothing whatever to assist the educa and other groups to meet the growing need cuts that the Government have imposed

Mrs. Rumbold: The hon. and learned be disappointed to know that the represe have had have been nothing like as categ insisted they are. Indeed, the majority of tions that we have had may have objecte of our reform Bill, but they have accepted such categorical statement on the whole o Reform Bill as he suggests has been Department.

Mr. Ashby: Is my hon. Friend awa Leicester county council is controlled by th and the alliance together, not by the Cons hon. and learned Member for Leicester, W said? Is she also aware that that council parents to send their children to l authorities in other areas, across the bor Has she had any representations from pa that there are schools just 100 yards do which they cannot send their children, but send them sometimes seven miles or more she had any representations requesting i Education Reform Bill of freedom of borders?

Mrs. Rumbold: Our proposals within Reform Bill on the matter of open enrolme mean that parents will have an opportun that they get the school of first choice for This is an extremely important principle choice for parents. I am a little surprised to hon. Friend that the authority is not allow cross boundaries, because it is my understa is the ability for children to cross boundarie legislation.

O-Level Examination Resul

12. Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secreta Education and Science whether he will give for each year since 1979 of (a) girls and O-level mathematics, craft, design and te physics, who obtained grades A and B.

Mr. Dunn: Over the period 1978-79 t percentage of school leavers in England w grades A-C in GCE O-level and grade 1 CSE has shown an increase in mathematics, craft design and technology and other science, and physics. Since 1978-79 more boys than girls have gained a higher grade in each of these subjects, but the proportion of those doing so has increased at a faster rate for girls than for boys. I shall publish the information asked for in the Official Report.

Ms. Ruddock: I thank the Minister for that answer. I hope very much that he shares my concern that boys are still achieving more highly than girls in science and mathematics subjects. Given that there is evidence, in mixed schools particularly, that there is an apparent lack of interest in and aptitude for science in girls as compared with boys, and given that the national curriculum will make those subjects compulsory for all, what specific plans does the Minister have to ensure that interest in those subjects by girls is encouraged and to help teachers avoid the presentation of science as a masculine pursuit?

Mr. Dunn: We have specifically asked the mathematics and science working groups that are advising on attainment targets and programmes of stud mind that the curriculum should pr opportunities for boys and girls and to con work the expectations and aptitudes of girls to those subjects.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Does my hon. Frie what is important about children's examinat not the gender of the children but the autho schools they go? Some of the highest spendin in this country have the worst examination r

Mr. Dunn: My hon. Friend is entirely proposals in the Education Reform Bill will, o on all education authorities, irrespective of t nature.

Student Grants

14. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will amend the student awards regulations so that married women are no longer dependent on their husband's income for grant purposes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: No. The Government consider that, where the husband or wife of a student has the means to contribute to the student's maintenance costs, it would be wrong to increase the share of those costs which is borne by the taxpayer.

Mrs. Mahon: Does the Minister realise that the discriminatory nature of the present system prevents many mature women from returning to higher education? Does he not think that it is time for a change in the present system?

Mr. Jackson: I must point out to the hon. Lady that there has been a substantial increase in the number of women university students between 1979 and 1986, from 38 to 42 per cent. It is a basic principle of the system of student support, which is of course being re committee that I am chairing, that the fa support the student, whether it is the parents o

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Prime Minister if her official engagements for Tuesday 19 Janu

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret That morning I had meetings with ministerial col others. In addition to my duties in the Hous having further meetings later this afternoon. T I am speaking at the Britain-Australi bicentennial celebration at the Guildhall.

Mr. Rowe: Will my right hon. Friend find to consider the many opportunities that coul which are not being made available to volun ages, to assist the public services? Will s Ministers to reconsider the work of their Dep make available more opportunities to the many who would like to contribute on an organised

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that voluntary work has a great deal to contribute to our community life, and I think that the number of voluntary organisations is one of the characteristics of life in this country. I know how much voluntary work contributed to the clearance after the recent hurricane in my hon. Friend's part of the world. I shall, of course, ask Ministers to consider the matter again to see if they can do more.

Mr. Kinnock: If, as we are told, the Government have the money to cut taxes, why do they not the money to cut the waiting time for those children now in urgent need of vital operations?

The Prime Minister: The number of children being treated now, particularly for cardiac surgery, has increased enormously. Indeed — [Interruption.] — for every five cardiac operations that were carried out up to 1979, about eight or nine are carried out now.

Mr. Kinnock: May I say to the Prime Minister, in the words of Mr. Steve McCallum, a member of the west midlands "Young at Heart Campaign" yesterday that "We are not political."—

[Interruption.] The parents of children needing cardiac operations will have heard Conservative Members laughing at those words. They continue:

"We are fighting for the lives of children. Children's lives are more important than party politics. We don't want to hear figures and statistics quoted for this year and that year. What we want is a National Health Service, a Birmingham Children's Hospital and the best service they can get."

Did the Prime Minister refuse to see Mr. McCallum and other parents and their children yesterday because she knew that if she did she would hear home truths like that?

The Prime Minister: I shall give the right hon. Gentleman the figures that he does not want to hear. He does not want to hear them because they are so good. Cardiac operations at the Birmingham children's hospital are up by 86 per cent. since 1978. In 1978 there were 155. In 1987 there were 288. The right hon. Gentleman says that he does not wish to use these matters party politically. That is the record. May I point out that one of the cases that were prominent in the House last week — that of Matthew Mulhall—was also mentioned again on Friday and it was pointed out that Matthew had a leaking heart valve and that his consultant advised his parents that it would be "best to allow him to grow so that the largest possible replacement heart valve can be used."

It was envisaged that his operation would take place in four to six months' time. Finding the facts did not stop people falsely raising that case in the House.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the £10·5 million of taxpayers' money being spent on the Commission for Racial Equality, the £3·4 million being spent on the Equal Opportunities Commission and the £2 million being spent on courses for trade unionists at our colleges would be better spent on the nation's health?

The Prime Minister: It has been our policy to do as much as we can to see that there is equality of opportunity in Britain, but I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will have heard my hon. Friend's very effective question.

Q2. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 19 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fearn: As tourism is the fastest growing industry in the world, will the Prime Minister confirm that funds will be available for the British tourist industry, and, indeed for the north-west of England, which is the most beautiful part of Britain? When the Prime Minister replies, will she smile? I have been here seven months and I have never seen her smile yet.

The Prime Minister: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that tourism is an important and growing industry. Last year it helped to create 44,000 new jobs. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment has announced that support for tourism will increase next year by 9 per cent., bringing the total up to nearly £50 million. Allocations to the regional boards, including the north-west, are now being considered.

Mr. Cash: Has my right hon. Friend noticed the report in The Times today about an unemployed man who started out with the enterprise allowance with a zero turnover, but who, in the space of nine months, has increased that to £560,000 a year? Does that not prove that under her Government enterprise is thriving in Britain and will continue to do so?

The Prime Minister: I am aware of that case. The enterprise allowance has been an enormous success and has enabled many young people to start up in business on their own, creating not only jobs for themselves but for many others, showing that enterprise and vitality are still very much present in Britain's young people.

Q3. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 19 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Boyes: Exactly why would the Prime Minister not meet the parents of children who came to see her yesterday about their children's urgent and desperate need for heart surgery?

The Prime Minister: We do not normally receive petitions. There are quite a large number. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, we usually carry out between eight to 11 engagements in one day. There was a most excellent debate late on Friday afternoon on the Birmingham children's hospital, which met most of the points that were raised by the parents.

Mr. Dickens: If I were to—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Dickens.

Mr. Dickens: If I were to ask my right hon. Friend to give the House the recipe for the splendid performance of the British economy, what main essential ingredient would she list?

The Prime Minister: If my hon. Friend will allow me two, not one, I would say—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is a perfectly legitimate question.

The Prime Minister: If he will allow me three and not one, I suggest: sound financial policies each and every year, the right legal framework, and incentives to enterprise.

Q4. Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 19 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Dr. Thomas: Will the Prime Minister take time today to study the representations made to the Government by the Irish Government and the European Commission about a proposal by the CEGB to undertake a test in Trawsfynydd power station in my constituency on 12 February, which will include operating the reactor without the normal cooling procedures? Will she respond to those representations and clearly tell the Secretary of State for Energy and the CEGB that such a test does not pass the test of community acceptability in the community that surrounds the power station? If she or the Government allow that test to go ahead, would she, because of her great commitment to nuclear power, like to attend the test and supervise it in person?

The Prime Minister: Much better than that, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman will agree, the test will take place only with the full approval of the independent Nuclear Installations Inspectorate, and will be monitored by it. It will be carried out only after the reactor has been fully shut down for its statutory inspection. All automatic safety systems will be operating normally. No safety systems will be cut off. I understand that there have been two similar tests in the past.

Mr. Hayes: Will my right hon. Friend cause strong representations to be made to the American Government for allowing Seamus Twomey, a former chief of staff of the IRA, to be fêted at a banquet in New York for raising funds for Noraid?

The Prime Minister: I am aware of my hon. Friend's strong views. I think we all feel strongly about this, but the American Administration and President have been forthright in condemning anyone who pursues violence as a way of achieving a political objective. The President has done everything possible to make it clear that that is wholly unacceptable.

Mr. Steel: It is—[Interruption.] It is always good to see enthusiasm. Is the Prime Minister aware that tomorrow a delegation of Scottish local authorities is coming to the House to protest at the sheer cost of introducing the poll tax north of the border? Is she aware that the £12 million that the Government have given in no way meets the £25 million of the cost of the administration? Would not that money be better spent on the Health Service in Scotland?

The Prime Minister: The community charge is a way of paying for local government which properly distributes the payment over a wider number of people. In fact, it meets only about a quarter of local expenditure. As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, the other three quarters is met by industry and the taxpayer.

The enthusiasm that the right hon. Gentleman heard expressed was because we thought he might be asking, or telling us, about his policy.

Mr. Allason: When my right hon. Friend considers the Government's much-awaited reform of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act, will she give serious consideration to formalising the role of the D-Notice committee and, in particular, consider introducing a publications review board along the lines of the one that has worked so well in America?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend had best wait until the White Paper comes out. We expect it to be out in about June.

Q5. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 19 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Michie: Is the Prime Minister aware of early-day motion 310, bearing 142 signatures, in which it is claimed that 25,000 signatures have been collected to fight to keep open the Nether Edge maternity unit in Sheffield? How can she justify her statement that the Health Service is safe in her hands when, in spite of all the pressures and arguments, the unit will still be closed? Will she personally meet a delegation from Sheffield and deal with the situation?

The Prime Minister: This is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health and for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, who deal with such matters. However, the hon. Gentleman will be pleased because I understand that a new children's hospital will be opening in Sheffield next year.

Mr. Marlow: Unlike the leader of the Labour party, Conservative Members are not worried about elections, but supposing that at the next general election the electorate should make a slight mistake and not give us a overall majority, what lessons would my right hon. Friend learn from last week about trying to form a coalition with the Social and Liberal Democrats?

The Prime Minister: That is a mistake that the Conservative party will not make.

Q6. Mr. Wall: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 19 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wall: Is the Prime Minister aware that only six out of 12 intensive care beds are in use for heart operations in the Yorkshire regional cardiothoracic centre at Killingbeck hospital in Leeds? Will she join the vast majority of senior medical staff at that hospital in requesting from the regional health authority three extra intensive care units, or will she tell the staff at that hospital who, in the vast and lengthening queue of patients, young and old, will have to wait for surgery?

The Prime Minister: The number of cardiac operations, the amount of resources and the number of doctors and nurses have greatly increased. We are looking carefully at why some regional and district health authorities are able to manage much better than others on their allocations of money, and why in some surgery wards in some hospitals the beds are left empty between patient treatment for one day while in others they are left for up to three days. We are now getting a great deal of interesting information, trying to make the best use of the facilities available and taking lessons from those who have been most successful in that.

Points of Order

3.32 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There is a report in today's Financial Times saying:

"the Home Secretary is expected to outline his plans for the expansion of UK radio in Parliament today."

It is a matter of great discourtesy that those proposals will be outlined in Parliament by way of a parliamentary question that was tabled yesterday, the answer to which will be available between 4 o'clock and 4.30 this afternoon. This is part of the consultation process.

The Government have issued a Green Paper about the future of radio broadcasting in Britain. It would be normal procedure to expect a White Paper and certainly a statement from the Home Secretary at the Dispatch Box to enable us to discuss matters of great significance and importance for broadcasting in Britain. I have not seen the planted reply, but I understand that we are to hear about three new national stations which will be auctioned off. There will be major changes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know nothing about this matter. If we had had a statement today on this issue it would have delayed the start of the debate, in which I have the names of no fewer than 58 right hon. and hon. Members wishing to speak. There is nothing I can do about the hon. Member's comments.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Register of Members' Interests is important for the operation of certain Standing Orders. The Select Committee on the Register of Members' Interests announced on 8 December that it had agreed on its publication. That document has not yet appeared. It is important that it is published so that we can see whether Tory MPs who accuse nurses of moonlighting are themselves moonlighting by an extensive range of directorships and parliamentary adviserships, like the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit).

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the Register is available for inspection in the Library, but I will look into the matter that the hon. Gentleman has raised.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance as a member of the First Scottish Standing Committee. This morning we were unable to conduct our business——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot give any guidance to the hon. Gentleman on that. As I stated last week, in answer to a broadly similar point of order, what goes on in a Standing Committee cannot be raised with me on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Tony Banks: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is nothing further to it at all. I say to the hon. Gentleman that he has made his point. I can do nothing about it. It is not a matter for me. It is not a matter of order. Ten-minute Bill——

Mr. Banks rose——

Mr. Speaker: No. I say again to the hon. Gentleman that I cannot hear any more on that matter.

Underground Fires (Research and Control) and Land Protection

3.36 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to improve research into and services directed towards the prevention, combat, control and extinction of underground fires; and to protect land affected by such fires from consequential damage from subsidence.

Before referring specifically to the modest scope of the Bill I am seeking leave to introduce, I wish to place into a wider context the problems the Bill will seek to tackle, which I hope will illustrate the importance and significance of the measures I propose. There are two main reasons for seeking to extend and co-ordinate expertise in handling natural disasters or acts of God; the types of incidents associated with floods, gales and certain fires. First, complexities arise from the rapid technological changes which are taking place around us, or at least apart from in the Chamber.

Centralised aid and back-up facilities are required to monitor, prevent and, if things go wrong, handle local disasters such as the floods affecting Strabane in Northern Ireland, which could arise in complex new harbour developments such as the Felixstowe dock. The gales which recently hit the south could hit high-rise, man-made structures or complex chemical and nuclear plants. Fires can hit complex underground workings and facilities.

The coal mining industry has had 80 cases of heating in the past year and has a long tradition of fires that require stoppings to be placed within pits. The new technology of Selby-type developments means that the problems associated with such fires are extended. The recent King's Cross disaster revealed massive problems in handling underground fires where passages act as wind tunnels, producing unmanageable fires. Bodies such as the Fire Brigades Union have produced well-documented figures on potential accidents and fire incidents in the proposed Channel tunnel.

Apart from these many technological factors, a second set of problems is faced in handling such disasters—the cuts in local government funding. There have been cuts via the rate support grant, and rate capping and grant capping in Derbyshire. Now we are to have the poll tax and the unified business rate, all pushing down the provisions and facilities for local government services, unless the House can prevent the latter development.

Emergency services dealing with nuclear waste, chemical explosions, extensive floods, sweeping gales or fire hazards could be sustained, even in a less than adequate form, if the Department of the Environment established units to provide research and back-up to help prevent or combat the situations I have touched upon.

I concentrate my remaining remarks on underground fires and the need for my Bill. The definitions of three categories of underground fires should be established: the man-made tunnel with supporting walls, such as the Mersey tunnel; the tunnelling exercise to establish those provisions, including mining activities, where roof support is the only method of protection; and underground fires in closed, confined areas where there is no direct access by individuals, such as the fire in the coal seam which occurred at Oakthorpe in Leicestershire and the fire at Dronfield in my constituency, where waste material caught alight under an industrial estate that had been constructed out of waste. The last category could also include other potential sources of fire where gas pipes, oil resources and the like are ignited. It is the final category of enclosed underground fires that my Bill will deal with. The available expertise in handling other underground incidents will need to be brought into consideration by the structure that is set up in the Bill. I am seeking the setting up of a special unit under the supervision of the Department of the Environment, whose services and resources of expertise can be drawn on by local authorities that are now faced with complex matters that go beyond their normal experience and expertise.

At the moment, an interdepartmental committee, which is serviced by the Department of the Environment, is discussing the redevelopment of contaminated land. In July 1986, it produced a second draft of a paper on the fire hazards of contaminated land. It dealt with the main hazards of underground fires and listed them as:

"1. Production and release of toxic . . . noxious gases which can travel considerable distances through the ground; 2. subsidence of the burnt ground, causing physical damage to any buildings or other structures on or near the site of the fire, and creating hidden cavities which may make tackling the fire or reclaiming the land hazardous; 3. heat damage to buried structures and site services, such as power supply cables."

It continues:

"All these hazards are dangerous on derelict sites and much more so on sites which are being or have already been developed. After development has been completed, it may be more difficult and expensive to repair the damage."

The final points made in the report are exactly illustrated by the problems that arose in my constituency in the underground fire at Dronfield.

A lead is required to introduce this measure, and I hope that it will be used and built upon in future after the appropriate unit has been established in the Department of the Environment to begin to tackle some of the wider hazards that I have mentioned associated with floods, fires and gales.

I hope that the Bill will gain general support in the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Harry Barnes, Mr. John Cummings, Mr. Harry Cohen, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Mr. Frank Cook, Mr. Martin Redmond, Mr. Don Dixon, Mr. Bernie Grant, Mr. Alan Meale, Mr. Dennis Skinner and Mr. John Battle.

Underground Fires (Research and Control) and Land Protection

Mr. Harry Barnes accordingly presented a Bill to improve research into and services directed towards the prevention, combat, control and extinction of underground fires; and to protect land affected by such fires from consequential damage from subsidence: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 22 April and to be printed. [Bill 83.]

Opposition Day

[7TH ALLOTTED DAY]

National Health Service

Mr. Speaker: Before the debate on the National Health Service, I must announce that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister. I should repeat what I said earlier in answer to a point of order: no fewer than 58 right hon. and hon. Members have written to express their interest in speaking in the debate, and there may be others. Many of them are Privy Councillors, so I make a special plea for brief contributions.

The House has not given the Chair authority to limit speeches to 10 minutes, but it would be helpful if all Back-Bench speeches could be limited to 10 minutes on this motion.

3.43 pm

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): I beg to move,

That this House notes that two out of three health authorities anticipate a deficit at the end of the current financial year and that attempts to balance their accounts have produced closures of hospital wards and cancellation of operations; affirms its commitment to the principle of a National Health Service providing comprehensive, free treatment to all citizens on the basis of need, not payment; further notes that current Treasury revenue substantially exceeds expenditure; and therefore calls upon Her Majesty's Government to release additional funds to end the financial crisis in the Health Service, and to drop proposals for new charges for dental examinations and for eyesight tests.

This is the second occasion on which the Opposition have named health for their Supply debate within the past two months. I wish to advance three reasons why we took the view that it was not only appropriate but essential that the House should have an opportunity to return to this vital matter today.

The first reason is the evidence, accumulating since we last debated the issue only two months ago, that the NHS is currently in financial crisis. Indeed, the weight of evidence pointing to that financial crisis is now so massive that even the Law Officers of this Government must be considering advising their client to plead guilty. May I produce the witnesses who have come forward in the past two months since we debated the issue to confirm the state of crisis in which they have to operate?

The first witness is the chairman of the consultants' committee of the British Medical Association. Last month he announced that that committee was setting up a survey of the acute specialties and he said:

"The acute sector is falling apart at the seams."

The director of the Association of Community Health Councils published its survey only this month. That survey showed that 56 out of 113 health authorities proposed to close wards — some of them entire hospitals — in this financial year. The director stated:

"Unless there is action now, some parts of the NHS, already on the brink of collapse, will simply fall apart during 1988."

In Oxfordshire, 296 general practitioners signed an advertisement opposing the closure of 140 beds. That advertisement said:

"These cuts will cause considerable suffering and very possibly hasten death in some patients."

[Mr. Robin Cook]

Consultants at St. Mary's hospital, Paddington wrote to the press saying:

"We have a duty to inform the public that the fabric of the NHS is crumbling about us."

Consultants at the Birmingham children's hospital wrote to the press stating that they now turn away 30 acute cases every week, and added:

"We no longer accept that this service is safe in the Government's hands."

Most damning of all was a statement, not by any doctor or any nurse or even by Brian Redhead of the BBC, but by the hospital manager of the Manchester royal infirmary last week. He wrote to the 2,500 employees of that hospital advising them that he could no longer pay for drugs and that, by the end of the financial year, he may no longer be able to pay for their wages. He added:

"To all intents and purposes we are bankrupt. If we were a commercial organisation we would have gone into voluntary liquidation".

The Government pride themselves on introducing a commercial ethos into the NHS. They have now achieved a new first — they have introduced the concept of bankruptcy into the NHS. Looking at the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister and her colleagues, I am astonished that it has the nerve to express their support for the dedicated staff of the NHS. If the Government have such respect for the staff of the NHS, they should listen to what those staff are saying to them day after day.

In truth, in the past two months, the Government have sought to pin the blame on the very staff who work in the NHS. Last month, it was the fault of the consultants. Bernard Ingham, the true voice of the Government, briefed the press on the basis that too many consultants were nipping off to do private practice. I find it breathtaking that the Government, who have done everything possible to encourage consultants to do more and more private practice, should now identify that as their excuse. In 1980, the Government even changed the consultants' contracts so that those full-time NHS consultants might carry out private practice in the time when they are paid a full-time salary by the NHS. However, I welcome the Government's repentance and their belated recognition of the fact that, if one extends private medicine, the people who are neglected are the patients on the NHS waiting lists.

Such private practice by consultants is not the major source of the current crisis. At present, all round Britain, health authority managers are telling consultants to slow down and to cut their output. They are being told to go off to the golf course, do a spot of gardening, do anything but increase the rate at which they operate on their waiting list. Indeed, at the Queen Elizabeth hospital in Birmingham some surgeons have been instructed to carry out 10 per cent. fewer operations next year than this year.

Last week a new culprit was discovered. The right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), who is to grace us with a speech in this debate, discovered that it was not the consultants but the nurses who were to blame—with a little help from the BBC. The right hon. Gentleman informed us that too many nurses were moonlighting. There is a fat lot of support for the dedicated staff of the NHS in that statement. I am not entirely sure that I follow the right hon. Gentleman's logic. Presumably, if those nurses stopped moonlighting, the staffing crisis in our hospitals would be even worse. However, I bow to right hon. Gentleman's superior knowledge moonlighting.

Mr. Norman Tebbit (Chingford): If the hon. Gentle had listened to what I said, he might have perceive although it is doubtful, as his abilities in that respect limited—that my objection was to the crazy systen the Health Service which frequently precludes nurses f working overtime in their own hospitals but allows t to work overtime as agency nurses in another hosp While a nurse is doing that, a girl from a second hosp is busy working overtime as an agency nurse in hospital. That is my objection.

On moonlighting, Opposition Members might be from doing a little themselves. It might add to the de if we had a bit more moonlighting and a little moonshine.

Mr. Cook: I would acquit the right hon. Gentlema the charge of merely having moonlighted. Since he ret as chairman of the Conservative party, he has g through the whole galaxy of night-time work. On explanation that he has offered of his speech on Fri I am bound to say that if that was what the right h Gentleman intended to convey to the press, he sign failed to choose the correct words to put his mess across.

Furthermore, NHS nurses do not fail to do overtim their own hospitals. If the right hon. Gentleman followed the documents that have been cascading from professional bodies for the past two months, he wo have seen the survey carried out at the request of the Ro College of Nursing by independent surveyors, discovered that 60 per cent. of nurses did an average of hours a week unpaid overtime in their own hospit Those are the people whom the right hon. Gentle maligns.

At the weekend, the nurses were superseded by a culprit. I was distressed to read that my opposite numb the Secretary of State, is now being fingered as the culp I feel a personal sense of involvement in seeking to acq the Secretary of State. I am glad to see him back at Dispatch Box and looking so well. It is as well tha should put that on the record, because it is immediately apparent that all his colleagues feel the sa The charge being made in the alcoves of the Westmin bars is that he has created chaos out of order sin handedly and in seven months—taking two months for illness the while. Think what he could have achie had he remained in good health throughout the se months. It is a ludicrous charge. The crisis that has erup in the past few months has been years in the brewing.

Yesterday, I took part in a radio package in which hon. Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan) a participated. The hon. Gentleman was Minister for Hea during the first three years of this Government's period office. I praise him for his refreshing candour and hones On "The World at One" yesterday the hon. Gentlem said:

"We have known this would be crisis year since 1981. They knew it was coming. They did nothing to avert They deliberately planned the financial squeeze that g rise to the current crisis.

I have no doubt that we shall again hear figu showing the growth in the NHS budget. I invite right h and hon. Members to bear in mind that one third of t increase took place before 1981 and was almost entirely attributable to the Clegg awards. Most of the increase since 1981 has taken place outside the hospital sector, among the family practitioner services, which are, of course, demand-led. We can see what would have happened to expenditure on those services had they been cash-limited by looking at what did happen to the hospital sector during the same period. In 1986, the Select Committee on Social Services reviewed the hospital budget between 1981 and 1986 and concluded that, in volume terms, the increase was 3·1 per cent. over the entire five years.

The Minister for Health has answered a question pointing out the demographic pressures on the hospital budget and quantifying it in percentage terms. During those same years, when the hospital budget increased by 3·1 per cent., on the Minister's own figures, demographic change added a 4·3 per cent. burden to the hospital sector alone. We do not have a report from the Select Committee for 1987, but it is possible to update those figures. Indeed, the King's Fund has done so and has identified a 3·4 per cent. increase in volume terms over the six years 1981-87 and a 5·4 per cent. increase in the pressure from demographic change during the same period.

Demographic change is racing ahead by two thirds of the increase in the budget of our hospitals. That is why they are now in crisis. That is why wards are closing and patients are being turned away. However, these are statistics that the Prime Minister has chosen not to use in her weekly exchanges with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Will the hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that, if the Labour party is elected to government in the future, it is prepared to commit sufficient funds to the National Health Service to eliminate waiting lists totally? If he is prepared to give that undertaking, which flows from the logic of his argument, will he estimate the cost of that? If he is not prepared to give that undertaking, will he tell us which elements of the waiting lists he is prepared to live with and which he would prefer to eliminate?

Mr. Cook: Only last week, my right hon. Friend made a clear statement of the five points that we are putting forward as our commitment to the NHS. Those commitments have been costed. They mean making good the reduction in expenditure in the hospital sector during the past six years. They involve a planned and controlled expenditure increase to reduce waiting lists, rather than the ad hoc, one-off cosmetic gestures that we get from the Government.

There are other statistics which the Prime Minister chooses not to use, which shed a different light on the record of her Government. However, those statistics occasionally slip out when the guard is down. My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) obtained an interesting answer last week, which showed that expenditure on nurse training has decreased from £479 million in 1979 to £439 million in 1986. That is one reason for the staffing crisis in our hospitals.

There are also the accelerating figures on bed closures in acute specialties. During the Government's first three years, we lost 5,000 beds for acute specialties. I concede straight away to the Secretary of State that that was more or less on trend with the long-term decline in the number of beds for acute specialties.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cook: No, I shall continue my speech.

During the next four years, we lost over 10,000 beds for acute specialties and last year we lost 5,000 acute specialty beds. That is three times the rate for the figure for only eight years earlier—[Interruption.] I am asked about waiting lists. Well, the waiting list for March 1987 was 15,000 higher than for the year before. We do not yet have the figure for September 1987 but, so far, every waiting list figure for September under this Government has been higher than any September figure under the previous Labour Government.

We also have the figures for infant mortality. Last year, alone among Western nations and for the first time since 1970, infant mortality increased in Britain. When the Prime Minister was taxed about that a fortnight ago, she was so shocked by the increase that for once she lost her confidence in statistics and said:

"It may well be that it is a statistical error."—[Official Report, 12 January 1988; Vol. 125, c. 141.]

I am afraid that there is no statistical error. However, I can say that the Prime Minister was absolutely right to point out that the increase did not take place in the first four weeks after birth—which is the period of intensive medical care — but in the subsequent 11 months, between the first and the 12th month of life: the post-neonatal period. I have before me a press statement by Peter Pharoah, professor of community health at Liverpool university, who said:

"Post-neonatal deaths are much more affected by social factors such as unemployment, housing conditions, low income".

That brings us to another set of statistics about the present Government. Survey after survey shows that unemployment makes people ill. The unemployed are 40 per cent. more likely to suffer from cancer, and 200 per cent. more likely to commit suicide. Even the wives of unemployed men have a higher mortality rate, and their children have a higher infant mortality rate. The current rate of unemployment, in the calculation of the British Medical Journal, causes an additional 3,000 deaths a year.

If the Government wish to trade statistics, there are plenty with which we can cap any that they produce. Ultimately, however, the trading of statistics is an exercise as sterile as any operating theatre in the National Health Service. Whether the position is better or worse than in 1979 is an argument of obsessional interest to professional politicians, and to just about no one else. People outside this Chamber see their wards closing and their operating theatres being shut down. They see a real problem, and they want to hear a solution to it. They may well have the wit to work out for themselves that those wards and operating theatres stayed open throughout the period of the last Labour Government. However, they are not interested in comparisions with the past; they want to know what plans have been made for the future.

That brings me to the second reason for returning to the issue. It is now clear that the Government are planning on the expectation that the coming year will be even worse than the one that we have just been through. On 18 November, the two junior Health Ministers met the regional health chairmen in Cambridge. One of the chairmen said afterwards:

"The chairmen went in to bang the table and make sure ministers understood just how bad things are out there. There wasn't any need."

[Mr. Cook]

The two Ministers

"just acknowledged it and said in effect it was going to get worse".

I have with me the letter that the Minister for Health subsequently sent to the chairmen of the regional health authorities. I do not believe that he has yet placed it in the Library; perhaps he will do so after the debate. The letter is, of course, beautifully crafted by some civil servant and written in coded terms, but it is not difficult to break the code and decipher what is meant by the "need for realism" or "more rational use of resources".

Paragraph 3 of the letter makes it clear that there will not be a penny more for 1988-89, while paragraph 6 states that there will be the same pressure for cost improvement programmes in the next year. The Minister accepts that "some of the more obvious things have now been done and that attention will increasingly need to be given to the cost effective use of clinical resources."

In other words, cost improvement programmes will shift this year from ancillary services to patient care.

Paragraph 8 makes it clear that the health authorities must plan on the expectation that pay increases will not be fully funded this year:

"Authorities will therefore need to plan flexibly and recognise that they may well be called on to meet some pay and price pressures in 1988/89."

For "may well", we may read that they can bet their bottom nurse that that will happen.

I have a letter from the North-West regional health authority, which was sent out following that circular, instructing every district health authority in the north-west to cut its real budget by 1·5 per cent. next year. That of course includes Manchester royal infirmary. All the chairmen in the Yorkshire health authority area were summoned to a meeting with the regional chairmen on Friday, and instructed to cut their budgets by 1 per cent. in the next financial year. I have before me the papers put before Bloomsbury district health authority last week, which show that, in the coming financial year, there will be an additional shortfall of nearly £3 million.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): My hon. Friend referred to Yorkshire. Is he aware that Bradford health authority, in a document that was leaked this week, is shown to be planning to cut health services by more than £3 million over the next two years. The infant mortality rate in the city is twice the national average, and the authority plans to close a maternity unit. Heart illness is way above the national average, and it plans to cancel the appointment of a second cardiac specialist.

The overwhelming majority of people would forgo tax cuts to improve and defend their local health services. What message has my hon. Friend for the people who want a better Health Service, and not more tax cuts? How will he persuade the Government to take that message on board?

Mr. Cook: When my hon. Friend allows me to resume, I shall try to ram that message home. The point that he makes underlines the statement by the British Cardiac Society only last week that 10 million people are living in district health authorities with no cardiac specialists in the hospitals. We are told that the response to the problem——

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Will the hon. Gent give way?

Mr. Cook: No, I shall proceed with my speech if

Mr. Favell: I want to take up a point that the Gentleman has just made.

Mr. Cook: If the hon. Gentleman will bear with am sure that he can aspire to catch your eye, Mr. Sp

We are told that the response to the problem expenditure must be more cost-effective, but the which we are managing our hospitals at pres ludicrously cost-ineffective. Whole operating theatr standing idle because they cannot afford the margin of operations. These may be cuts, but they are not sa They represent waste on an extravagant scale: investment, wasted technology and wasted skills. If going to bring those skills and investment back int we need extra resources.

Mr. Favell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cook: No, I shall not give way to the Gentleman: I have made that perfectly clear to him. plainly not interested in hearing what I wish to say t and I therefore doubt very much whether he will lis my reply.

For a moment last week, a light flickered. The Sec of State met the three presidents, who emerged to sa he had discussed with them extra resources for the The very next day, the Chief Secretary puffed ou light: the Government would not budge fro commitment that they had made in the A Statement.

The Secretary of State will know that, when he to this address, he will have to explain who has got it Was the Chief Secretary folded up in a corner of the keeping notes while he met the three presidents, o the three presidents right when they emerged to sa their fears had been allayed?

There is, of course, a weasel way out. The stat claims that there was a recognition of the need for resources. Perhaps the Secretary of State proposes t the line that he recognises the need for extra resour long as they do not come from the Chancellor Exchequer. Let the money come from alternative fu from income generation or from lotteries — any but from the Government.

We now come to the interesting rhetorical body s that Conservative Members keep practising. Wh they are pushed into a corner to admit the inadequa public funding, they start talking rapidly about p funding. But private funding of the NHS has noth do with value for money. The Government's handl private pay beds has been a first-rate commercial di They have increased private pay beds in our hospit a quarter, and, during the same period, the numb patients in those beds has fallen by one fifth. The tot debts of the NHS from private patients has escalated year, and now stands at £11 million — more tha Government anticipate that they will gain from i generation. In the light of that experience, o Government who had smashed the learning curve persist in the delusion that a financial problem c solved with more pay beds.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncs Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that it is Labour policy to end pay beds at a cost of some £60 million and, incidentally, to end competitive tendering at a cost of £100 million? Does he agree that such dogma resulted in the pay of nurses falling for three years out of four under the Labour Government?

Mr. Cook: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to talk about dogma, let us consider dogma. Let us look at the instruction from the Minister of State to the West Midlands regional health authority that it can have £250,000 to buy private operations in private hospitals, but only to buy private operations and not to spend in its own hospitals. It is a sort of Health Service parallel to the assisted places scheme. On inquiring of BUPA, the health authority discovered that a hip replacement operation in a private hospital would cost £700 more than in its own hospitals and that a hysterectomy would cost £400 more.

Meanwhile, in Wolverhampton the regional health authority has so starved the district that it has closed the operating theatre for the orthopaedic ward. All hip replacements in Wolverhampton have ceased. To save what? To save a sum that is actually less than the amount that the Minister of State offered to the west midlands, earmarked for the purchase of orthopaedic operations in the private sector.

If the hon. Gentleman wants a little dogma, I can think of no clearer and finer illustration than paying over the odds to subsidise the private sector while forcing the closure of identical facilities in the NHS. That has nothing to do with cost-effectiveness but it has everything to do with political dogma.

That brings us to the heart of the debate between ourselves and those on the Government Benches. In truth, this is not a debate about public spending priorities; it is a debate about political values. The reason the NHS is under siege is that the Government's vision of a private enterprise society cannot tolerate the contradiction of a public health system that is more efficient and more comprehensive than its private sector competitor.

Those who sit on this side of the Chamber have the advantage of being able to see the Prime Minister's face, so we notice a revealing feature that may be lost on those who sit behind her. Whenever the Prime Minister recites the extra spending on the NHS under her Government, she does not do it with pride, satisfaction or relish; she does it with self-evident resentment. In her eyes, the NHS commits two fatal offences. The first is that everyone is equal, regardless of ability to pay. The second is even worse than the first: the service is actually popular because of that.

I do not know whether the right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) is with us today. The right hon. Gentleman has participated in exchanges on this subject outside the House. I particularly relished his speech on the fringe of the Conservative party conference last autumn, when he advocated an insurance system, with the Church of England catering for those who could not afford insurance. That does not seem an adequate solution for those who live in Scotland.

The right hon. Gentleman expressed the difference between our parties very well, I thought. He is on record as saying:

> "The problem with the National Health Service is that there is no link between what people pay and what they receive, and no way of influencing what they receive by what they are prepared to pay."

The right hon. Gentleman sees that as a problem. We s it as a strength of the NHS. Having glimpsed that gulf political values between us, I think we can understand wh the NHS is in financial crisis and why it will be kept financial crisis. What we see as a crisis of the NHS som Conservative Members see as an opportunity to claim tha the NHS cannot deliver and as an excuse to dismantle service that they never liked. How else can we explain th persistent refusal to give it more funds, when we all kno that the Chancellor's wallets are as ample as his presenc

That brings me to the third reason why it is importa that the House debate the matter again. It is more tha ever transparent that the Government can afford to fun the NHS. I note that The Times today quotes a Whitehal source as saying that the Secretary of State's argument wi be:

> "If you haven't got it, you cannot spend it."

Possibly the Whitehall source, who may be with us, woul stand up and disclose himself so that we may see who responsible for that wonderful observation.

The fact is that, in terms of financial resources, th Government have got the necessary funds. The Chancell would need a JCB to cart the current Treasury surplu around Whitehall. Only today the Treasury, wit impeccable timing, released the public sector borrowin requirement figures, which show that the PSBR is now minus figure; that is Treasury language for being surplus. There is a surplus of £400 million rather than planned deficit of £4,000 million. Greenwell Montag estimates that next year the surplus could be £11,00 million.

Perhaps I may dampen the enthusiasm of ho Members on the Government Benches. Greenwe Montagu might not be spot on. Suppose it is wildly wron Suppose it is only half right. Suppose the surplus is onl £5,000 million. That would still be enough to cut tax b the 2p beloved by the Chancellor and to give £2,00 million more to hospitals.

We saw on "Weekend World" that the Harris po discovered that 68 per cent. of Conservative Bac Benchers would rather see tax cuts than increase spending on the NHS. Those hon. Members need agoni no more. They can have both their passion for tax cut without any nagging doubts as to whether they are bein faithful to the wards back home, and more expenditure o the NHS. If Greenwell Montagu is more wrong and there is only a quarter of that sum, there can be no seriou doubt that if the Government have to choose, this year th priority must be not tax handouts but rescuing the NH

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Onga rose——

Mr. Cook: No; I am moving to my conclusion.

If there is any doubt, may I conclude by reflecting o the people whose health and hopes are in our hands whe we vote tonight? The most remarkable feature of the pa year has been that tens of thousands of operations hav been cancelled. No one knows how many, because n statistics are collected nationally. No one ever cancelle operations en masse before. We know that all district have been postponing non-emergency operations until th next financial year. One district alone has cancelled 3,50 non-emergency operations.

Who are the patients who are non-emergency case They are patients in pain from hernias, patients goin immobile from arthritis, patients who know that their hip will deteriorate and that the operation will be more difficult when they get it, patients going blind—like the lady I met at the weekend who waited six months for the first examination for cataract, only to be told that she had another nine months to wait for the operation. They are patients with cancer, consumed with anxiety by the knowledge that the longer the operation is delayed, the less chance that it will be in time to be successful. There are also the parents whom my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and I met yesterday, driven to distraction by worry that the next time their child is called for operation it may be cancelled as it was last time.

Time after time in the last few months, consultants have said that it was not reasonable, fair or just that they be asked to decide who gets an operation and who does not, who dies and who lives. Ultimately we decide whether those patients will get their operations. It is our responsibility. This year the Chancellor of the Exchequer has the money to ensure that we get a National Health Service that can deliver to its patients. Tonight the House will have the opportunity to instruct him to make those patients his top priority.

4.20 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. John Moore): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and add instead thereof:

"applauds the achievement of the National Health Service in providing a record level of patient care; recognises that this achievement rests on the substantial additional funds from the taxpayer which a strong economy has made possible and which has supported the dedicated work of the National Health Service staff; and welcomes the Government's continued commitment to the most effective use of all the Service's growing resources to bring about a further rise in the standard of health care, both in hospitals and in the community".

May I start by genuinely thanking the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), my "shadow", for his kind remarks with regard to my illness. He and I have known each other for many years and I am always conscious of his continuing courtesy and personal politeness, and I do appreciate it.

Having said that, I know that the House, as I think both I and the hon. Gentleman would wish it to, will treat a subject of this importance in the 40th anniversary year of the National Health Service with the serious, rational and thoughtful tone that it clearly needs. Health—or illness, as I certainly know to my personal cost—arouses deep emotion, but we will not find long-term solutions in emotion alone. It will require clear thinking. And above all—and I stress this in the light of the remarks that the hon. Gentleman finished with — it will require a successful economy.

May I start, therefore, with the fundamental point that good health needs and must have a successful economy. That has been the essence of the argument of the hon. Member for Livingston and of his right hon. and hon. Friends in the past few weeks. They have argued that the only answer — and they have put it in the motion in terms of a "financial crisis" — is essentially to spend more public money. They want more, that is, than the increases that we have provided and more than the increases we have promised. It is the only answer that they have offered. The awful, fascinating and terrifying thing for them is that that is the only offer we know deliver if, ever again, we have the tragedy of h in office.

I know full well and accept entirely, becau not dishonourable men and women, that they d to hurt the Health Service, and never intend when they were last in office. But when th collapsed in their period of office, let me first House of the priority they put on health car attitude towards staff. I will come to the contr attitude afterwards. Let me remind the House in which they handled future investment in th their responsibilities when in office. First, publ on the Health Service fell from 5 to 4·7 per ce while they were in office.

Miss Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): Will th clarify that health expenditure next year wi percentage of GDP under this Government?

Mr. Moore: No, I will not. In a little w explain precisely the increases, as the hon. M Livingston asked me to do. I shall also go beyo decline and specify them for the Leader of the when I come to comparisons with the Go period of office. I shall specify the actual amou we are talking about, and deal with the wa Labour treated Health Service staff. Oppositio are concerned quite rightly about staff, becau a key ingredient in the success of the Health S

Ancillary staff had their incomes reduced i in the five years that Labour were in office by 4 Administrative and clerical staff had the reduced in real terms by 14·4 per cent. For d dentists, the decline was 22·4 per cent. in real te had their pay cut in real terms for three years r in 1976-77 by no less than 10 per cent. in real t five years to 1979, nurses had a reduction in p cent.

I shall come to the comparisons with our moment. I said that there were three pillars wanted to compare the record before going on patient care. The third of those is investment i I and many of my right hon. and hon. Friends the House when investment in the capital of th Health Service was slashed by 30 per cent. in Is this a record of which the Opposition are p

What is the contrast to that appalling reco have the temerity to criticise in this Chamb again that because of our successful manage economy we have a bigger GDP to help financ services. Let us examine our priorities, becaus key question. First I shall deal with the percenta we have spent. I shall come then to the specifi fairly asked by the hon. Member for Livingsto to his comments in the newspapers.

I remind the House that the GDP percenta from 5 to 4·7 under Socialism. What has happ It has increased from 4·7 per cent. and not to but to 5·4 per cent. of GDP, so the percentage GDP has increased. That is why we are able to enormous additional amounts of money. I dealing with the points made about pressures, b actual amounts of money, quoted time and increase of 33 per cent. in real terms.

Just suppose for a moment that we had had with or without North sea oil, of having the in office for the past eight and a half years, with the same increase in the size of the economy that we have achieved and 4·7 per cent. growth in GDP, which is the Opposition's chosen priority as a percentage. How much less would have been spent today, or in this year or last year? Spending would not have been £21 billion, but £18·1 billion. They would have spent £2·9 billion less, even with their own sense of priorities.

What about staff, who are treated so appallingly? I did say, Mr. Speaker, that before I dealt with staff I would cover the specific points made by the hon. Member for Livingston about what he thought was the difference between my views and those of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. There is no difference at all; quite the reverse. People are able to do even basic calculations and consider matters post my party conference speech. Even though we now have the listening party sitting opposite, they do not necessarily spend their time listening to Conservative party conference speeches; but in my speech I made it quite clear that resources for the Health Service must increase.

What has happened since then? In the public expenditure round that was recently announced, there were the increases that had been planned before the general election, with £1·1 billion of further increases, which is £700 million more than had been planned. There were those increases, which I referred to in my meeting with the presidents of the royal colleges, and which were referred to by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, and rightly, as the hon. Member for Livingston says, moneys that will come from the cost improvement programme and additional moneys that we hope will come from an increase in resources from the private sector.

Those figures have been tabulated, and we can consider the totals and calculate what has been spent in the past and what will go into health care next year. It might be of help to the House to know what they are. The total gross increase for 1988-89 in real terms will be 2·1 per cent. If we add to that the extra resources expected to come from CIP, that will be 3 per cent., which is far more than most of the Opposition have argued for. I am assuming those additions on the simple basis of the very good experience of the past few years.

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): I should like to ask the Minister, despite what he is saying about increases, whether he can explain the paradox of my own local district health authority? As a result of the extra moneys that were given to maintain services, which I suggest is an admission of gross under-funding, those sums of money will enable us at the end of this month in theory to open closed wards. But we cannot employ the nurses to staff those wards and, indeed, we shall be forced to close wards again at the end of the financial year. Even the increases that the Secretary of State has announced for next year will not enable us to keep those services in existence.

Mr. Moore: Before I comment on the specific point, the hon. Member for Livingston would not, I know, want me simply to talk about the increases within the National Health Service as a whole, because he rightly tried to distinguish between the acute care hospital sector and the National Health Service, while acknowledging that there had been massive increases in real terms in the primary health care services. If one just looks at the HCHS and at the total gross increase in the coming year, excludi CIP programme expected yield, that will be an incre real terms next year of 2·2 per cent., including th improvement programme at 3·4 per cent.

To be specific, the hon. Member for Lewi Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) shares the dilemma RAWP disadvantage that many of us, including who live within a Thames region have faced since Hon. Members who had experience and responsibi the time will recognise the nature of the chang reduction in the population and the problems asso with the Metropolis with regard to the attraction o

Mr. Moore: I know that a very large numb Members wish to speak. I have given way so far would like to get on as I have quite a few things t

Mr. Favell: Is it not also the case that within the sector the performance of hospitals varies enormo draw my hon. Friend's attention to some figures re published by the North-West regional health auth which show that last year the cost of an in-patient Stepping Hill general hospital was £605·28, yet at Manchester general hospital, where NUPE had re been on strike, the cost per in-patient case was £1,1

Mr. Moore: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend planning to tackle that particular point later.

I was comparing the percentage of gross do product spent on health care. I then wanted to co the appalling record of the Labour Government wi own Government's record in regard to improvi remuneration of staff. We have heard many times House, and I will not burden hon. Members by rep them, the figures of staff increases, but I think it esp important to remind the House how those dealing d with patients have increased as a proportion from 5 per cent.

In particular, I think that the record on the nurses merits attention compared with the app record of the Opposition when in office. We ha simply established the proper pay arrangements th the pay review body; we are seeking to establish a p grading structure for nurses and midwives recognises the particular individual's skills and r sibilities. I know that all hon. Members will be partic pleased that the Nursing and Midwifery Staffs Negot Council has reached agreement on the new g definition, which has been sent to the review body.

The third point that I said I wanted to touch o investment in the future of the National Health S The building of the new NHS from the appalling sl of programmes that existed when we took office ha proceeding massively in the last eight years. As op to a reduction of 30 per cent., we have seen an in in real terms, of 40 per cent. We are now runn programme where we are spending £1,000 million on building the new NHS in the United Kingdom. this shows what can be achieved with a successful ecc under our Government in contrast to the failure economy under Socialism.

I now want to illustrate, because I think that this i many hon. Members would want me to do, what, end of the day, this means to patients. This, surely, i we are all talking about. What these resources a enormous efforts that the National Health Service staff have put into improved efficiency, which must be recognised, have meant in terms of patient care is quite staggering. To describe the service as being on the point of collapse, in the light of these figures, is really appalling.

The achievements of the service, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said last week—[Interruption.] I seem to have heard an interruption from a sedentary source asking why I did not use it. Happily, throughout my adult life, I have been able to benefit from the NHS, whether in Whittingham hospital, University College hospital or St. Thomas' hospital, and I am not sensitive in any way. I would assume that the listening party would like to listen to the end of these remarks.

Every member of my family has used and continues to use the NHS. I shall never forget the debt that I owe to the St. Helier hospital, where my mother died of cancer. I shall never forget the treatment that the doctors and nurses gave. But it is a bizarre feature of the world in which we now live that, because, as a consequence of my experience and knowledge, I was willing for many years, along with my wife, to pay less than I paid when I used to smoke as a modest contribution to the premiums of a non-profit-making organisation, when I chose this time not to burden the Health Service, not to force myself upon it, somehow it is regarded as wrong. That is one of the reasons why this country will never again elect the present Opposition to office.

Our great National Health Service deals with six in-patients for every five in 1978, 11 out-patients for every 10 in 1978—these are the realities for the constituents of Opposition Members—and nearly two day cases for every one in 1978. Those are the patients who are now receiving treatment in our acute care hospitals.

Mr. Robin Cook rose——

Mr. Moore: I will continue for a little while, if I may.

There is not just more treatment, but better and more complex treatment. For example, many of us know that the first coronary heart bypass operation took place in the United Kingdom in the mid-60s. Three such operations are now being done for every one in 1978. Members of the Opposition do not want to hear the facts.

Mr. Cook rose——

Mr. Moore: I will give way in a minute, when I have completed these figures because these are the figures of real patient care—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us get back to the debate and the arguments, not personalise it.

Mr. Moore: Five treatments are being given for chronic renal failure for every two in 1978. Four hip replacements are being done compared with three in 1978. We are doing not only double the kidney transplants that we were doing in 1978, but more than any other European country. There were 30 bone marrow transplants in 1978; there is nearly one a day now. It is the Opposition, in the face of the reality of the great achievements of the National Health Service, who have lost their way. Finally, there were three heart transplants in 1979—in the whole year—but 176 in 1986, as well as 51 heart-lung transplants. Those are the figures of our NHS today.

Mr. Cook: If the Secretary of State is on the situation in our hospitals being so m it was under the Labour Government, ca the House why during that Labour Gov never necessary for the presidents of the r go and see the then Secretary of State necessary for 1,000 consultants to go and Minister; it was never necessary for gener to pay for advertisements warning their pa happening to them; and it was never no BMA to set up a survey of acute specialti

Mr. Moore: I will, of course, come to t and the points on demography in a sec memories seem to be failing here, I will r Member of what happened in 1978. On pa Donaghue's book, he said—and I bel relevant—that in 1978 and that it led to the NHS crisis in Aug almost beyond belief for the Oppositio temerity not to remember the winter of 1978-79.

The statistics are not just bald statisti millions of families who have benefited each hospitals and many patients whose quality improved by operations scarcely possible The hon. Member for Livingston asked wh success story, the service is still under such

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) rose—

Mr. Moore: I wish to deal with this legitimate matter to address.

Despite the increased efficiency and the we have promised for the future, we must factors before we can consider the way forw see these factors as opportunities rather t They relate to demography, to medical tech changes and to what some of my hon. Frie calling from a sedentary position the le expectations of a more affluent society.

The picture is not unknown to most hon. consider seriously the dilemmas that we f society. Happily, we are living longer. The doubled since 1951. The over-80s will doubl implications for the National Health enormous. As we grow older, demands Service increase disproportionately. When 54·6 per cent. of NHS beds are used by th dimensions of the problem are better Technology is not a problem, but an oppo accept that point. The reality of increased a reflection of that.

The second feature of the inter-relatio change in demography is the total and wo in medical technology which has enabled us diagnose and treat conditions that wou ignored or left dormant in the recent past.

that new technology, there are rising expectations about what the NHS can provide and legitimate changes in the consumerist attitude of an affluent Britain.

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Moore: In an affluent Britain, consumers want more choice and expect to get the kind of choices that we are seeking to provide.

What, then, is the way forward? We must remember that the key to our policy must be a successful economy generating the wealth that allows us to continue the increases in resources that we have provided and promised, if we are to satisfy the legitimate public expectations of health care. I wish to concentrate on six matters beyond the basic improvement of the economy.

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Moore: We must improve and enhance the service in the face of technology, demography and rising expectations. We must press on for greater efficiency. This is not simply a matter of being a good accountant. It is a matter of trying to use valuable resources in health care and nobody should want anything different.

We must acknowledge and give great credit to the Health Service for what it has already done in this matter. The cost improvement programmes have radically improved the way in which it can add money to health care. As a consequence of the cost improvement programme, £1·3 billion is now the cumulative addition to health care. We have streamlined the service by abolishing area health authorities and we have introduced general management which is beginning to produce major improvements. We have introduced competitive tendering which is saving £100 million a year, which will go into better patient care.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): I notice that there is one comparison that the Minister has not made. Does he agree that every year, apart from one since the Government came to office in 1979, there has been a decrease in the amount of money spent on nurse training? It is the lack of quality nursing care which affects those who are waiting for hole in the heart operations. Can he explain why the Government have spent less money on nurse training since 1979?

Mr. Moore: It is critical that we address the point raised by the hon. Lady and the nature of the change in demography which has given us a smaller and different pool. It is part and parcel of the way in which we have approached the clinical grading review, about which I am delighted, and of the way in which we consider Project 2000. This is an area of critical training and is a key to the future. I know that the hon. Lady will be helping in this.

I wish to explain what has been achieved beyond the improvements in competitive tendering. There has been a better use of beds. I hate to use the terminology of the accountant——

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro) rose——

Mr. Moore: —but it is important to see the way in which the throughput of beds used has increased by 36 per cent. There has been a dramatic increase in day care. A vital part of this will be the provision of more and better information to doctors about the cost of the treatment that they provide and about the basis of our current resource management initiative.

Mention has already been made of the d between authorities. When we are discussing th use of resources, we must consider published much more carefully. We now have 450 indica system was established by my predecessor the Se State for Employment in 1983-84 and was first in the latter part of 1985. We are beginning to benefits from it.

Mr. Matthew Taylor rose——

Mr. Moore: If we consider the nature of the us the length of stay and the cost per case, the varia still enormous. Even when we take into acc differences in the size of districts, geography, p and activity, these figures will help hon. Me understand the nature of the efficiency gains. consider general surgery and the annual numb patient cases, the lowest figure of bed use give health authority runs at 27·8 per cent. and th figure runs at 70 per cent., so there is an e difference.

Mr. Matthew Taylor rose——

Mr. Moore: Equally, the average length of s in-patient in general surgery varies between th half days and 11 days.—[Interruption.] Unles secure the most efficient use of valuable resource good putting more resources into health care.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Will hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Moore: I know that hon. Members interested in the facts.

The cost per case — the third level — th revenue in-patient expenditure on major acute ho the average district varies between a low of £467 a of £1,231. Those figures show the enormous op for improvements.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: The right hon. Gentle well illustrated the increased throughput in beds it as an example of efficiency, but why have not w crucial statistic on the readmission of patients been pushed out of hospital and who have h readmitted? For example, only a few day constituent of mine, having rescued people from house and been admitted to hospital after he was discharged at 3.30 am and had to walk 20 mi

Mr. Moore: I shall ask my right hon. Fr Minister for Health to pursue that constituency at the end of the day in every case the removal from hospital is a matter for clinical judgment, n Government.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): hon. Friend has rightly given some conclusive Will he take heart from the fact that year in, yea Public Accounts Committee looks at the NHS an that there is further work to be done in those a

Mr. Moore: I thank my hon. Friend who many years of distinguished service on th Accounts Committee.

I said that there were six areas I wanted to part of the way forward. The second, beyond achieve major efficiency gains, is to encoura authorities to take full advantage of the income g powers contained in the Health and Medicines Bill which is now being discussed in Committee. Those are not insignificant amounts of money. At least £70 million a year could be generated and my Department will shortly set up a special unit to encourage and help health authorities to pursue this initiative.

Thirdly, I want to encourage health authorities to use — this is critical and I know that many of my hon. Friends share our view — spare capacity in other authorities whenever it is sensible and cost-effective to do so. That is already happening in part under the waiting list initiative. I want to encourage it, to improve the accounting information systems and to give patients a better knowledge of the system through giving better information to general practitioners.

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Moore: I have given way frequently and I think that it would assist the House if I were to move forward.

Fourthly — this is important — I want to seek to increase the total resources going into health care by encouraging further co-operation with the private sector. I shall not allow narow-minded dogma to stop resources being used for patient care. One of the great weaknesses of Britain's Health Service is the small contribution made by the private sector compared with that in other countries.

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Moore: In France, 2·7 per cent. of GDP goes into health care from the private sector, in Germany 1·8 per cent., in Canada 2·1 per cent., and in Holland 1·9 per cent., compared with only 0·5 per cent. in the United Kingdom. There is a clear gap there. We must seek to encourage such contributions.

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Moore: Fifthly, we shall improve the primary care services. The hon. Member for Livingston has recognised the major increases in real resources in those in the past eight years. They are critical to our acute care hospital service because they are the gateway to the expensive hospital sector. The announcements in our White Paper about the way in which we are seeking to amend general practitioners' terms of service to clarify their role in the provision of health promotion services and the prevention of ill health are critical. Equally, we want to introduce a range of incentives through general practitioners' pay to encourage them to carry out specific activities such as attaining target levels of vaccination and screening. That has been welcomed by most hon. Members.

Sixthly — this is also important and surrounds the debate outside as well as inside the House—I want us to focus much more on the overall objective of our health care policies. Our aim is clear — better health for the nation. So much of today's debate has been trapped on inputs—money, staff and beds. I accept that those are important, but we look too little at the outcome or the outputs. We need better indicators and targets to help us to judge good health against which we can judge our inputs and objectives.
